The image shows a highly decorative book cover with a floral and Art Nouveau style. The background is a textured, light brownish-gold color. A central rectangular label with a dark border contains the text "CHAPLOTTE" and "DE PLE" in a simple, sans-serif font. The cover is adorned with various floral motifs in shades of red, green, and dark brown. At the top, there are three flowers: a five-petaled flower on the left, a large lotus-like flower in the center, and a tulip-like flower on the right. Below these are two large, dark brown, stylized scroll-like elements. The bottom half of the cover features a central stem with several leaves and flowers, including a small red flower at the top, a large red flower on the left, a dark brown flower on the right, and a large red flower at the bottom right. The entire design is framed by a decorative border with a repeating pattern of small, dark, stylized shapes.

CHAPLOTTE
DE PLE

HENRY ALTEMUS

CHARLOTTE
TEMPLE

ROWSON

PHILADELPHIA

SUSANNA ROWSON

CHARLOTTE
TEMPLE

PHILADELPHIA
HENRY ALTEMUS

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2013

RBR
Jantz
#485

CHARLOTTE TEMPLE.

A Tale of Truth.

CHAPTER I.

A BOARDING-SCHOOL.

“ARE you for a walk?” said Montraville to his companion, as they arose from table; “are you for a walk, or shall we order a chaise and proceed to Portsmouth?” Belcour preferred the former; and they sauntered out to view the town and to make remarks on the inhabitants as they returned from church.

Montraville was a lieutenant in the army; Belcour was his brother officer; they had been to take leave of their friends previous to their departure for America, and were now returning to Portsmouth, where the troops waited orders for embarkation. They had stopped at Chicester to dine; and knowing they had sufficient time to reach the place of destination before dark, and yet allow them a walk, had resolved, it being Sunday afternoon, to take a survey of the Chichester ladies as they returned from their devotions.

They had gratified their curiosity, and were preparing to return to the inn without honoring any of the belles with particular attention, when Madame Du Pont, at the head of her school, descended from the church. Such an assemblage of youth and innocence naturally attracted the young soldiers; they stopped; and as the little cavalcade passed almost involuntarily pulled off their hats. A tall, elegant girl looked at Montraville and blushed; he instantly recollected the features of Charlotte Temple, whom he had once seen and danced with at a ball at Portsmouth. At the time he thought her a very lovely child, she being then only thirteen; but the improvement two years had made in her person, and the blush of recollection which suffused her cheeks as she passed, awakened in his bosom new and pleasing ideas. Vanity led him to think that pleasure at again beholding her might have occasioned the emotion he had witnessed; and the same vanity led him to wish to see her again.

“She is the sweetest girl in the world,” said he, as he entered the inn. Belcour started. “Did you not notice her?” continued Montraville. “She had on a blue bonnet, and with a pair of lovely eyes of the same color, has contrived to make me feel devilish odd about the heart.”

“Pooh!” said Belcour; “a musket-ball from our friends, the Americans, may, in less than two months make you feel worse.”

“ I never think of the future,” replied Montraville, “ but am determined to make the most of the present, and would willingly compound with any kind Familiar who would inform me who the girl is and how I might be likely to obtain an interview.”

But no kind Familiar at that time appeared, and the chaise which they had ordered driving up to the door, Montraville and his companion were obliged to take leave of Chichester and its fair inhabitant and proceed on their journey.

But Charlotte had made too great an impression on his mind to be easily eradicated; having, therefore, spent three whole days in thinking of her, and endeavoring to form some plan of seeing her, he determined to set off for Chichester, and trust to chance either to favor or frustrate his designs. Arriving at the verge of the town, he dismounted, and sending the servant forward with the horses proceeded toward the place, where, in the midst of an extensive pleasure-ground, stood the mansion which contained the lovely Charlotte Temple. Montraville leaned on a broken gate and looked earnestly at the house. The wall which surrounded it was high, and perhaps the Arguses who guarded the Hesperian fruit within were more watchful than those famed of old.

“’Tis a romantic attempt,” said he; “and should I even succeed in seeing and conversing with her, it can be productive of no good. I must of necessity leave England in a few days, and probably may never return; why, then, should I endeavor to engage the affections of this lovely girl, only to leave her a prey to a thousand inquietudes of which at present she has no idea? I will return to Portsmouth and think no more about her.”

The evening was now closed; a serene stillness reigned; and the moon with her silver crescent faintly illuminated the hemisphere.

The mind of Montraville was calmed by the serenity of the surrounding objects. "I will think on her no more," said he, and turned with an intention to leave the place; but as he turned he saw the gate which led to the pleasure-grounds open and two women come out, who walked arm in arm across the field. "I will at least see who these are," said he.

He overtook them, and after saluting, begged leave to see them into the more frequented part of the town; but how was he delighted, when, waiting for an answer, he discovered, under the concealment of a large bonnet, the face of Charlotte Temple.

He soon found means to ingratiate himself with her companion, who was a French teacher at the school, and at parting, slipped a letter he had purpose-ly written into Charlotte's hand, and five guineas into that of mademoiselle, who promised she would endeavor to bring her young charge into the field again the next evening.

CHAPTER II.

DOMESTIC CONCERNS.

MR. TEMPLE was the youngest son of a nobleman, whose fortune was by no means adequate to the antiquity, grandeur, and, I may add, pride of the family. He saw his elder brother made completely wretched by marrying a disagreeable woman, whose fortune helped to prop the sinking dignity of the house; and he beheld his sisters legally prostituted to old, decrepit men, whose titles gave them consequence in the eyes of the world, and whose affluence rendered them splendidly miserable.

“I will not sacrifice internal happiness for outward show,” said he; “I will seek content; and if I find her in a cottage, will embrace her with as much cordiality as I should if seated on a throne.”

Mr. Temple possessed a small estate of about five hundred pounds a year; and with that he resolved to preserve independence, to marry where the feelings of his heart should direct him, and to confine his expenses within the limits of his income. He had a heart open to every generous feeling of humanity, and a hand ready to dispense to those who wanted, part of the blessings he enjoyed himself.

As he was universally known to be the friend of the unfortunate, his advice and bounty were frequently solicited; nor was it seldom that he sought out indigent merit, and raised it from obscurity, confining his own expenses within a very narrow compass.

“You are a very benevolent fellow,” said a young officer to him one day; “and I have a great mind to give you a subject to exercise the goodness of your heart upon.”

“You cannot oblige me more,” said Temple, “than to point out any way by which I can be serviceable to my fellow creatures.”

“Come along, then,” said the young man. “We will go and visit a man who is not in so good a lodging as he deserves; and were it not that he has an angel with him, who comforts and supports him, he must long since have sunk under his misfortunes.”

The young man’s heart was too full to proceed; and Temple, unwilling to irritate his feelings by making further inquiries, followed him in silence till they arrived at the Fleet prison.

The officer inquired for Captain Eldridge. A person led them up several pairs of dirty stairs, and pointing to a door which led to a miserable, small apartment, said that was the captain's room, and retired.

The officer, whose name was Blake-ney, tapped at the door, and was bidden to enter by a voice melodiously soft. He opened the door and discovered to Temple a scene which riveted him to the spot with astonishment.

The apartment, though small and bearing strong marks of poverty, was neat in the extreme. In an arm-chair, his head reclined on his hand, his eyes fixed on a book which lay open before him, sat an aged man in a lieutenant's uniform, which, though threadbare, should sooner call a blush of shame into the face of those who could neglect real merit, than cause the hectic of confusion to glow on the cheeks of him who wore it.

Beside him sat a lovely creature, busied in painting a fan mount. She was fair as the lily; but sorrow had nipped the rose in her cheek before it was half blown. Her eyes were blue, and her hair, which was light brown, was slightly confined under a plain muslin cap, tied around with a black ribbon; a white linen gown and plain lawn handkerchief composed the remainder of her dress; and in this simple attire she was more irresistibly charming to such a heart as Temple's than she would have been if adorned with all the splendor of a courtly belle.

When they entered the old man arose from his seat, and, shaking Blakeney by the hand with great cordiality, offered Temple his chair; and there being but three in the room, seated himself on the side of his little bed with evident composure.

“This is a strange place,” said he to

Temple, “to receive visitors of distinction in, but we must fit our feelings to our station. While I am not ashamed to own the cause which brought me here, why should I blush at my situation? Our misfortunes are not our faults, and were it not for that poor girl——”

Here the philosopher was lost in the father. He arose hastily from his seat, walked toward the window, and wiped off a tear which he was afraid would tarnish the cheek of a sailor.

Temple cast his eye on Miss Eldridge; a pellucid drop had stolen from her eye, and fallen upon a rose she was painting. It blotted and discolored the flower. “’Tis emblematic,” said he, mentally; “the rose of youth and health soon fades when watered by the tear of affliction.”

“My friend Blakeney,” said he, addressing the old man, “told me I could be of service to you; be so kind, then,

dear sir, as to point out some way in which I can relieve the anxiety of your heart and increase the pleasure of my own."

"My good young man," said Eldridge, "you know not what you offer. While deprived of my liberty, I cannot be free from anxiety on my own account, but that is a trifling concern; my anxious thoughts extend to one more dear a thousand times than life. I am a poor, weak old man, and must expect in a few years to sink into silence and oblivion, but when I am gone who will protect that fair bud of innocence from the blasts of adversity, or from the cruel hand of insult and dishonor?"

"Oh, my father!" cried Miss Eldridge, tenderly taking his hand, "be not anxious on that account, for daily are my prayers offered to Heaven that our lives may terminate at the same instant, and one grave receive us both, for why should I live when deprived of my only friend?"

Temple was moved even to tears. "You will both live many years!" he said, "and, I hope, see much happiness. Cheerily, my friend, cheerily; these passing clouds of adversity will serve only to make the sunshine of prosperity more pleasing. But we are losing time; you might, ere this, have told me who were your creditors, what were their demands, and other particulars necessary to your liberation."

"My story is short," said Mr. Eldridge, "but there are some particulars which will wring my heart barely to remember, yet to one whose offers of friendship appear so open and disinterested, I will relate every circumstance that led to my present painful situation. But, my child," continued he, addressing his daughter, "let me prevail on you to take this opportunity, while my friends are with me, to enjoy the benefit of air and exercise. Go, my love; leave me now; to-morrow, at the usual hour, I will expect you.”

Miss Eldridge impressed on his cheek the kiss of filial affection, and obeyed.

CHAPTER III.

UNEXPECTED MISFORTUNES.

“MY life,” said Mr. Eldridge, “till within these few years, was marked by no particular circumstance deserving notice. I early embraced the life of a sailor, and have served my king with unremitting ardor for many years. At the age of twenty-five I married an amiable woman; one son and the girl who just now left us were the fruits of our union. My boy had genius and spirit. I strained my little income to give him a liberal education; but the rapid progress he made in his studies amply compensated for the inconvenience. At the academy where he received his education, he commenced an acquaintance with a Mr. Lewis, a young man of affluent fortune; as they grew up, their intimacy ripened into friendship, and they became almost inseparable companions.

“George chose the profession of a soldier. I had neither friends nor money to procure him a commission, and had wished him to embrace a nautical life, but this was repugnant to his wishes, and I ceased to urge him on the subject. The friendship existing between Lewis and my son was of such a nature as gave him free access to our family, and so specious was his manner that we hesitated not to state to him all our little difficulties in regard to George’s future views.

“He listened to us with attention, and offered to advance any sum necessary for his first setting out.

“I embraced the offer, and gave him my note for the payment of it; but he would not suffer me to mention any stipulated time, as he said I might do it whenever most convenient to myself.

“About this time my dear Lucy returned from school, and I soon began to imagine Lewis looked at her with eyes of affection. I gave my child caution to beware of him, and to look on her mother as her friend. She was unaffectedly artless; and when, as I suspected, Lewis made professions of love, she confided in her parents, and assured us that her heart was perfectly unbiased in his favor, and she would cheerfully submit to our direction.

“I took an early opportunity of questioning him concerning his intentions toward my child; he gave an equivocal and suspicious answer—some angry words followed, and I forbade him the house.

“The next day he sent and demanded payment of his money. It was not in my power to comply with the demand. I requested three days to endeavor to raise it, determining to mortgage my half-pay, and live on a small annuity which my wife possessed, rather than be under any obligation to so worthless a man; but this short time was not allowed me, for that evening, as I was sitting down to supper, unsuspecting of danger, an officer entered and tore me from the embraces of my family.

“My wife had been for some time in a declining state of health; ruin at once so unexpected and inevitable was a stroke she was not prepared to bear; and I saw her faint in the arms of our servant, as I left my own habitation for the comfortless walls of a prison.

“My poor Lucy, distracted with her fears for us both, sank on the floor and endeavored to retain me by her feeble efforts, but in vain; they forced her to open her arms; she shrieked and fell prostrated—but pardon me—the horrors of that night unman me. I cannot proceed.”

He arose from his seat and walked several times across the room; at length, attaining more composure, he cried:

“What a mere infant I am! Why, sir, I never felt thus in the day of battle.”

“No,” said Temple; “but the truly brave soldier is tremblingly alive to the feelings of humanity.”

“True,” replied the old man (something like satisfaction darting across his features), “and painful as these feelings are, I would not exchange them for that torpor which the stoic mistakes for philosophy. How many exquisite delights should I have passed by unnoticed, but for these keen sensations, this quick sense of happiness or misery! Then let us, my friend, take the cup of life as it is presented to us, tempered by the hand of a wise Providence; be thankful for the good, be patient under the evil, and presume not to inquire why the latter predominates.”

“This is true philosophy,” said Temple.

“’Tis the only way to reconcile ourselves to the cross events of life,” replied he. “But I forgot myself. I will not longer intrude on your patience, but proceed with my melancholy tale.

“The very evening that I was taken to prison, my son arrived from Ireland, where he had been some time with his regiment. From the distracted expressions of his mother and sister, he learned by whom I had been arrested, and, late as it was, flew on the wings of wounded affection to the house of his false friend, and earnestly inquired the cause of this cruel conduct. With all the calmness of a cool, deliberate villain, he avowed his passion for Lucy, declared her situation in life would not permit him to marry her, but offered to release me immediately, and make any settlement upon her, if George would persuade her to live, as he impiously termed it, a life of honor.

“Fired at the insult offered to a man and a soldier, my boy struck the villain, and a challenge ensued.

“He then went to a coffee-house in the neighborhood, and wrote a long, affectionate letter to me, blaming himself severely for having introduced Lewis into the family, or permitting him to pay an obligation which had brought inevitable ruin on us all. He begged me, whatever might be the event of the ensuing morning, not to suffer regret or unavailing sorrow for his fate to increase the anguish of my heart, which he greatly feared was already insupportable.

“This letter was delivered to me early in the morning. It would be vain to attempt to describe my feelings on the perusal of it; suffice it to say, that a merciful Providence interposed, and I was for three weeks insensible to miseries almost beyond the strength of human nature to support.

“A fever and strong delirium seized me, and my life was despaired of.

“At length nature, overpowered with fatigue, gave way to the salutary power of rest, and a quiet slumber of some hours restored me to reason, though the extreme weakness of my frame prevented my feeling my distress so acutely as I otherwise should.

“The first object that struck me on awakening was Lucy sitting by my bedside; her pale countenance and dress prevented my inquiries for poor George; for the letter I had received from him was the first thing that occurred to my memory. By degrees the rest returned; I recollected being arrested, but could in no way account for being in this apartment, whither they had conveyed me during my illness.

“I was so weak as to be almost unable to speak; I pressed Lucy’s hand, and looked earnestly around the apartment in search of another dear object.

“‘Where is your mother?’ said I, faintly.

“The poor girl could not answer! She shook her head in expressive silence, and throwing herself on the bed, folded her arms about me and burst into tears.

“‘What, both gone?’ said I.

“‘Both,’ she replied, endeavoring to restrain her emotions; ‘but they are happy, no doubt.’”

Here Mr. Eldridge paused! the recollection of the scene was too painful to permit him to proceed.

CHAPTER IV.

CHANGE OF FORTUNE.

“IT was some days,” continued Mr. Eldridge, recovering himself, “before I could venture to inquire the particulars of what had happened during my illness; at last I assumed courage to ask my dear girl how long her mother and brother had been dead. She told me that the morning after my arrest, George came home early to inquire after his mother’s health, stayed with them but a few minutes, seemed to be greatly agitated at parting, but gave them strict charge to keep up their spirits, and hope everything would turn out for the best. In about two hours, as they were sitting at breakfast and endeavoring to strike out some plan to attain my liberty, they heard a loud rap at the door, which Lucy, running to open, she met the bleeding body of her brother, borne in by two men, who lifted it from a litter, on which they had brought him from the place where he had fought.

“ Her poor mother, weakened by illness and the struggles of the preceding night, was not able to support this shock; gasping for breath, her looks wild and haggard, she reached the apartment where they had carried her dying son. She knelt by his bedside, and taking his cold hand: ‘ My poor boy,’ said she, ‘ I will not be parted from thee; husband—son—both at once lost! Father of mercies, spare me !’ She fell into a strong convulsion, and expired within two hours. In the meantime a surgeon had dressed George’s wounds; but they were in such a situation as to bar the smallest hopes of recovery. He never was sensible from the time he was brought home, and died that evening in the arms of his sister.

“Late as it was when this event took place, my affectionate Lucy insisted on coming to me. ‘What must he feel,’ said she, ‘at our apparent neglect, and how shall I inform him of the afflictions with which it has pleased Heaven to visit us?’

“She left the care of the dear departed ones to some neighbors, who had kindly come in to comfort and assist her, and on entering the house where I was confined, found me in the situation I have mentioned.

“How she supported herself in these trying moments I know not; Heaven no doubt was with her; and her anxiety to preserve the life of one parent in some measure abated her affliction for the loss of the other.

“My circumstances were greatly embarrassed, my acquaintances few, and those few utterly unable to assist me. When my wife and son were committed to their kindred earth, my creditors seized my house and furniture, which, not being sufficient to satisfy their demands, detainers were lodged against me. No friend stepped forward to my relief; from the grave of her mother, my beloved Lucy followed an almost dying father to this melancholy place.

“ Here we have been nearly a year and a half. My half-pay I have given up to satisfy my creditors, and my child supports me by her industry; sometimes by fine needle-work, sometimes by painting. She leaves me every night, and goes to a lodging near the bridge; but returns in the morning to cheer me with her smiles, and bless me by her duteous affection. A lady once offered her an asylum in her family, but she would not leave me. ‘ We are all the world to each other,’ said she. ‘ I thank God I have health and spirits to improve the talents nature has endowed me with; I trust, if I employ them in the support of a beloved parent, I shall not be thought an unprofitable servant. While he lives I pray for strength to pursue my employment; and when it pleases Heaven to take one of us, may it give the survivor fortitude to bear the separation with due resignation; till then I will never leave him.' ”

“ But where is this inhuman persecutor ? ” said Temple.

“ He has been abroad ever since,” replied the old man; “ but he has left orders with his lawyer never to give up the note until the utmost farthing is paid.”

“ And how much is the amount of your debts in all ? ” said Temple.

“ Five hundred pounds,” he replied.

Temple started; it was more than he expected.

“ But something must be done,” said he; “ that sweet maid must not wear out her life in prison. I will see you again to-morrow, my friend,” said he, shaking

Eldridge's hand. "Keep up your spirits; light and shade are not more happily blended than are the pleasures and pains of life; and the horrors of the one serve only to increase the splendor of the other."

"You never lost a wife and son," said Eldridge.

"No," replied he, "but I can feel for those that have."

Eldridge pressed his hand, as they went toward the door, and they parted in silence.

When they got without the walls of the prison, Temple thanked his friend Blakeney for introducing him to so worthy a character; and, telling him that he had a particular engagement in the city, wished him a good-evening.

"And what is to be done for this distressed man?" said Temple, as he walked up Ludgate Hill. "Would to Heaven I had a fortune that would enable me instantly to discharge his debt; what exquisite transport, to see the expressive eyes of Lucy beaming at once with pleasure for her father's deliverance and gratitude for his deliverer; but is not my fortune affluence," continued he, "nay, superfluous wealth, when compared to the extreme indigence of Eldridge? And what have I done to deserve ease and plenty, while a brave officer starves in prison? Three hundred a year is surely sufficient for all my wants and wishes; at any rate, Eldridge must be relieved."

When the heart has will, the hands can soon find means to execute a good action.

Temple was a young man, his feelings warm and impetuous; unacquainted with the world, his heart had not been rendered callous by being convinced of its fraud and hypocrisy. He pitied their sufferings, overlooked their faults, thought every bosom as generous as his own, and would cheerfully have divided his last guinea with an unfortunate fellow creature.

No wonder, then, that such a man (without waiting a moment for the interference of Madame Prudence) should resolve to raise money sufficient for the relief of Eldridge, by mortgaging part of his fortune.

We will not inquire too minutely into the motive which might actuate him in this instance: suffice it to say, he immediately put the plan into execution; and in three days from the time he first saw the unfortunate lieutenant he had the superlative felicity of seeing him at liberty, and receiving an ample reward in the tearful eye and half-articulated thanks of the grateful Lucy.

“And pray, young man,” said his father to him one morning, “what are your designs in visiting thus constantly the old man and his daughter?”

Temple was at a loss for a reply; he had never asked himself the question; he hesitated, and his father continued:

“It was not till within these few days that I heard in what manner your acquaintance first commenced, and I cannot suppose anything but attachment to the daughter could carry you such imprudent lengths for the father; it must certainly have been her art that drew you into mortgaging part of your fortune.”

“Art, sir!” cried Temple, eagerly—“Lucy Eldridge is as free from art as she is from every other error; she is——”

“Everything that is amiable and lovely,” said his father, interrupting him, ironically. “No doubt, in your opinion, she is a pattern of excellence for all her sex to follow. But come, sir, pray tell me, what are your designs towards this paragon? I hope you do not intend to complete your folly by marrying her ?”

“ Were my fortune such as would support her according to her merit, I don't know a woman more formed to insure happiness in the marriage state.”

“ Then, prithee, my dear lad,” said his father, “ since your rank and fortune are so much beneath what your Princess might expect, be so kind as to turn your eyes to Miss Weatherby, who, having only an estate of three thousand a year, is more upon a level with you, and whose father yesterday solicited the mighty honor of your alliance. I leave you to consider on this offer, and pray remember that your union with Miss Weatherby will put it in your power to be more liberally the friend of Lucy Eldridge.”

The old gentleman walked in a stately manner out of the room, and Temple stood almost petrified with astonishment, contempt and rage.

CHAPTER V.

SUCH THINGS ARE.

MISS WEATHERBY was the only child of a wealthy man, almost idolized by her parents, flattered by her dependents, and never contradicted, even by those who called themselves her friends.

I cannot give a better description than by the following lines:

The lovely maid whose form and face
Nature has deck'd with every grace,
But in whose breast no virtues glow,
Whose heart ne'er felt another's woe,
Whose hand ne'er smooth'd the bed of pain,
Or eas'd the captive's galling chain:
But like the tulip caught the eye,
Born just to be admir'd and die;
When gone, no one regrets its loss,
Or scarce remembers that it was.

Such was Miss Weatherby; her form lovely as nature could make it, but her mind uncultivated, her passions impetuous, and her brain almost turned with flattery, dissipation, and pleasure; and such was the girl whom a partial grandfather left independent mistress of the fortune before mentioned.

She had seen Temple frequently; and fancying she could never be happy without him, nor once imagining he could refuse a girl of her beauty and fortune, she prevailed on her fond father to offer the alliance to the Earl of D——, Mr. Temple's father.

The earl had received the offer courteously; he thought it a great match for Henry; and was too fashionable a man to suppose a wife could be any impediment to the friendship he professed for Eldridge and his daughter.

Unfortunately for Temple, he thought quite otherwise; the conversation he had just had with his father discovered to him the situation of his heart; and he found that the most affluent fortune would bring no increase of happiness unless Lucy Eldridge shared it with him; and the integrity of his own heart made him shudder at the idea his father had started, of marrying a woman for no other reason than because the affluence of her fortune would enable him to injure her by maintaining in splendor the woman to whom his heart was devoted; he therefore resolved to refuse Miss Weatherby, and, be the event what it might, offer his heart and hand to Lucy Eldridge.

Full of this determination, he sought his father, declared his resolution, and was commanded never more to appear in his presence.

Temple bowed; his heart was too full to permit him to speak; he left the house precipitately, and hastened to relate the cause of his sorrow to his good old friend and his amiable daughter.

In the meantime, the earl, vexed to the soul that such a fortune should be lost, determined to offer himself a candidate for Miss Weatherby's favor.

What wonderful changes are wrought by that reigning power, ambition! The love-sick girl, when first she heard of Temple's refusal, wept, raved, tore her hair, and vowed to found a Protestant nunnery with her fortune; and commencing abbess, to shut herself up from the sight of cruel, ungrateful man forever.

Her father was a man of the world; he suffered his first transport to subside, and then very deliberately unfolded to her the offers of the old earl, expatiating on the many benefits arising from an elevated title; painted in glowing colors the surprise and vexation of Temple when he should see her figuring as a countess and his step-mother, and begged her to consider well before she made any rash vows.

The distressed fair one dried her tears, listened patiently, and at length declared she believed the surest method to revenge the slight put on her by the son, would be to accept the father; so said—so done, and in a few days she became the Countess D——.

Temple heard the news with emotion; he had lost his father's favor by avowing his passion for Lucy, and he saw now there was no hope of regaining it. "But he shall not make me miserable," said he. "Lucy and I have no ambitious notions; we can live on three hundred a year for some little time, till the mortgage is paid off, and then we shall have sufficient not only for the comforts, but many of the little elegancies of life. We will purchase a little cottage, my Lucy," said he, "thither with your reverend father, we will retire; we will forget that there are such things as splendor, profusion, and dissipation—we will have some cows, and you shall be queen of the dairy; in the morning, while I look after my garden, you shall take a basket on your arm, and sally forth to feed your poultry; and as they flutter round you in humble gratitude, your father shall smoke his pipe in a woodbine alcove, and viewing the serenity of your countenance, feel such real pleasure dilate his heart as shall make him regret that he has ever been unhappy.”

Lucy smiled, and Temple saw it was the smile of approbation. He sought and found a cottage suited to his taste; thither, attended by love and Hymen, the happy trio retired, where, during many years of uninterrupted felicity, they cast not a wish beyond the little boundaries of their own tenement. Plenty, and her hand-maid, Prudence, presided at their board; hospitality stood at their gate, peace smiled on each face, content reigned in each heart, and love and health strewed roses on their pillows.

Such were the parents of Charlotte Temple, who was the only pledge of their mutual love, and who, at the earnest entreaty of a particular friend, was permitted to finish the education her mother had begun, at Madame Du Pont's school, where we first introduced her to the acquaintance of the reader.

CHAPTER VI.

AN INTRIGUING TEACHER.

MADAME DU PONT was a woman in every way calculated to take care of young ladies, had that care entirely devolved on herself; but it was impossible to attend to the education of a numerous school without proper assistants; and those assistants were not always the kind of people whose conversations and morals were exactly such as parents of delicacy and refinement would wish a daughter to copy.

Among the teachers at Madame Du Pont's school was Mademoiselle La Rue, who added to a pleasing person and insinuating address a liberal education and the manners of a gentlewoman. She was recommended to the school by a lady whose humanity overstepped the bounds of discretion; for, though she knew Miss La Rue had eloped from a convent with a young officer, and on coming to England had lived in open defiance of all moral and religious duties, yet, finding her reduced to the most abject want, and believing the penitence which she professed to be sincere, she took her into her own family, and thence recommended her to Madame Du Pont, as thinking the situation more suitable for a woman of her abilities.

But mademoiselle possessed too much the spirit of intrigue to remain long without adventures. At church, where she constantly appeared, her person attracted the attention of a young man who was upon a visit at a gentleman's seat in the neighborhood; she had met him several times clandestinely, and being invited to come out that evening and eat some fruit and pastry in a summer-house belonging to the gentleman he was visiting, and requested to bring some of the ladies with her, Charlotte, being her favorite, was fixed on to accompany her.

The mind of youth easily catches at promised pleasure. Pure and innocent by nature, it thinks not of the dangers lurking beneath those pleasures until too late to avoid them.

When mademoiselle asked Charlotte to go with her, she mentioned the gentleman as a relation, and spoke in such high terms of the elegance of his gardens, the sprightliness of his conversation, and the liberality with which he entertained his guests, that Charlotte thought only of the pleasure she should enjoy in the visit, not of the imprudence of going without her governess' knowledge, or of the danger to which she exposed herself in visiting the house of a young man of fashion.

Madame Du Pont had gone out for the evening, and the rest of the ladies had retired to rest, when Charlotte and the teacher stole out of the back gate, and in crossing the field, were accosted by Montraville, as mentioned in the first chapter.

Charlotte was disappointed at the pleasure she had promised herself from this visit. The levity of the gentlemen and the freedom of their conversation disgusted her. She was astonished at the liberties mademoiselle permitted them to take, grew thoughtful and uneasy, and heartily wished herself at home again, in her own chamber.

Perhaps one cause of that wish might be an earnest desire to see the contents of the letter which had been put into her hand by Montraville.

Any reader, who has the least knowledge of the world, will easily imagine the letter was made up of encomiums on her beauty, and vows of everlasting love and constancy, nor will he be surprised that a heart open to every gentle, generous sentiment, should feel itself warmed by gratitude for a man who professed to feel so much for her, nor is it improbable that her mind might revert to the agreeable person and martial appearance of Montraville.

In affairs of love, a young heart is never in more danger than when attacked by a handsome young soldier. A man of indifferent appearance will, when arrayed in a military habit, show to advantage, but when beauty of person, elegance of manner, and an easy method of paying compliments are united to the scarlet coat, smart cockade, and military sash—ah! well-a-day for the poor girl who gazes upon him; she is in imminent danger, but if she listens to him with pleasure, 'tis all over with her, and from that moment she has neither eyes nor ears for any other object.

Now, my dear, sober matron—if a sober matron should deign to turn over these pages before she trusts them to the eyes of a darling daughter—let me entreat you not to put on a grave face and throw down the book in a passion, and declare 'tis enough to turn the heads of half the girls in England. I do solemnly protest, my dear madam, I mean no more by what I have here advanced than to ridicule those girls who foolishly imagine a red coat and a silver equalet constitute a fine gentleman; and should that fine gentleman make half a dozen fine speeches to them they will imagine themselves so much in love as to fancy it a meritorious act to jump out of a two-pair stairs window, abandon their friends, and trust entirely to the honor of a man who, perhaps, hardly knows the meaning of the word, and if he does, will be too much the modern man of refinement to practise it in their favor.

Gracious Heaven! when I think of the miseries that must rend the heart of a doting parent, when he sees the darling of his age at first seduced from his protection, and afterwards abandoned by the very wretch whose promises of love decoyed her from the paternal roof—when he sees her poor and wretched, her bosom torn between remorse for her crime and love for her foul betrayer—when fancy paints to me the good old man stooping to raise the weeping penitent, while every tear from her eye is numbered by drops from his bleeding heart, my bosom glows with honest indignation, and I wish for power to extirpate these monsters of seduction from the earth.

Oh, my dear girls—for to such only am I writing—listen not to the voice of love, unless sanctioned by paternal approbation; be assured, it is now past the days of romance; no woman can be run away with contrary to her own inclination; then kneel down each morning and request kind Heaven to keep you free from temptation; or should it please to suffer you to be tried, pray for fortitude to resist the impulse of natural inclination, when it runs counter to the precepts of religion and virtue.

CHAPTER VII.

NATURAL SENSE OF PROPRIETY INHERENT IN THE FEMALE BOSOM.

“ I CANNOT think we have done exactly right in going out this evening, mademoiselle,” said Charlotte, seating herself, when she entered her apartment; “ nay, I am sure it was not right; for I expected to be very happy, but was sadly disappointed.”

“ It was your own fault, then,” replied mademoiselle; “ for I am sure my cousin omitted nothing that could serve to render the evening agreeable.”

“ True,” said Charlotte, “ but I thought the gentlemen were very free in their manner; I wonder you would suffer them to behave as they did.”

“ Prithee, don't be such a foolish little prude,” said the artful woman, affecting anger. “ I invited you to go, in hopes it would divert you, and be an agreeable change of scene; however, if your delicacy was hurt by the behavior of the gentlemen, you need not go again; so there let it rest."

"I do not intend to go again," said Charlotte, gravely, taking off her bonnet, and beginning to prepare for bed. "I am sure, if Madame Du Pont knew we had been out to-night, she would be very angry; and it is ten to one but she hears of it by some means or other."

"Nay, miss," said La Rue, "perhaps your mighty sense of propriety may lead you to tell her yourself, and in order to avoid the censure you would incur should she hear of it by accident, throw the blame on me; but I confess I deserve it; it will be a very kind return for that partiality which led me to prefer you before any of the rest of the ladies, but perhaps it will give you pleasure," continued she, letting fall some hypocritical tears, "to see me deprived of bread, and for an action which by the most rigid could be esteemed but an inadvertency, lose my place and character, and be driven again into the world, where I have already suffered all the evils attendant on poverty."

This was touching Charlotte in the most vulnerable part; she arose from her seat, and taking mademoiselle's hand—"You know, my dear La Rue," said she, "I love you too well to do anything that would injure you in my governess' opinion; I am only sorry we went out this evening."

"I don't believe it, Charlotte," said she, assuming a little vivacity, "for, if you had not gone out, you would not have seen the gentleman who met us crossing the field, and I rather think you were pleased with his conversation."

"I had seen him once before," replied Charlotte, "and thought him an agreeable man, and you know one is always pleased to see a person with whom one has passed several cheerful hours. But," said she, pausing and drawing the letter from her pocket, while a general suffusion of vermilion tinged her neck and face, "he gave me this letter; what shall I do with it?"

"Read it, to be sure," returned mademoiselle.

"I am afraid I ought not," said Charlotte. "My mother has often told me I should never read a letter given me by a young man without first giving it to her."

"Lord bless you, my dear girl!" cried the teacher, smiling, "have you a mind to be in leading strings all your lifetime? Prithee, open the letter, read it, and judge for yourself. If you show it to your mother, the consequence will be, you will be taken from school, and a strict guard kept over you, so you will stand no chance of ever seeing the smart young officer again."

"I should not like to leave school yet," replied Charlotte, "till I have attained a greater proficiency in my Italian and music. But you can, if you please, mademoiselle, take the letter back to Montraville, and tell him I wish him well, but cannot, with any propriety, enter into a clandestine correspondence with him."

She laid the letter on the table, and began to undress herself.

"Well," said La Rue, "I vow you are an unaccountable girl. Have you no curiosity to see the inside now? For my part, I could no more let a letter addressed to me lie unopened so long than I could work miracles; he writes a good hand," continued she, turning the letter to look at the superscription.

"'Tis well enough," said Charlotte, drawing it towards her.

“He is a genteel young fellow,” said La Rue, carelessly, folding up her apron at the same time; “but I think he is marked with the smallpox.”

“Oh, you are greatly mistaken,” said Charlotte, eagerly; “he has a remarkably clear skin and a fine complexion.

“His eyes, if I should judge by what I saw,” said La Rue, “are gray, and want expression.”

“By no means,” replied Charlotte; “they are the most expressive eyes I ever saw.”

“Well, child, whether they are gray or black is of no consequence; you have determined not to read his letter, so it is likely you will never either see or hear from him again.”

Charlotte took up the letter, and mademoiselle continued:

“He is most probably going to America; and if ever you should hear any account of him it may possibly be that he is killed; and though he loved you ever so fervently, though his last breath should be spent in a prayer for your happiness, it can be nothing to you; you can feel nothing for the fate of the man whose letter you will not open, and whose sufferings you will not alleviate, by permitting him to think you would remember him when absent and pray for his safety."

Charlotte still held the letter in her hand; her heart swelled at the conclusion of mademoiselle's speech, and a tear dropped on the wafer that closed it.

"The wafer is not dry yet," said she, "and sure there can be no great harm——" She hesitated. La Rue was silent. "I may read it, mademoiselle, and return it afterwards."

"Certainly," replied mademoiselle.

"At any rate, I am determined not to answer it," continued Charlotte, as she opened the letter.

Here let me stop to make one remark, and trust me, my very heart aches while I write it; but certain I am that when once a woman has stifled the sense of shame in her own bosom—when once she has lost sight of the basis on which reputation, honor, everything that should be dear to the female heart, rests—she grows hardened in guilt, and will spare no pains to bring down innocence and beauty to the shocking level with herself; and this proceeds from that diabolical spirit of envy which repines at seeing another in full possession of that respect and esteem which she can no longer hope to enjoy.

Mademoiselle eyed the unsuspecting Charlotte, as she perused the letter, with malignant pleasure. She saw that the contents had awakened new emotions in her youthful bosom.

She encouraged her hopes, calmed her fears, and before they parted for the night, it was determined that she should meet Montraville on the ensuing evening.

CHAPTER VIII.

DOMESTIC PLEASURES PLANNED.

“I THINK, my dear,” said Mrs. Temple, laying her hand on her husband’s arm, as they were walking together in the garden, “I think next Wednesday will be Charlotte’s birthday. Now, I have formed a little scheme in my own mind to give her an agreeable surprise, and if you have no objection, we will send for her to come home on that day.”

Temple pressed his wife’s hand in token of approbation, and she proceeded:

“You know the little alcove in the bottom of the garden, of which Charlotte is so fond? I have an inclination to deck it out in a fanciful manner, and invite all her little friends to partake of a collation of fruit, sweetmeats, and other things suitable to the general taste of young guests, and to make it more pleasing to Charlotte, she shall be mistress of the feast, and entertain her visitors in this alcove. I know she will be delighted, and, to complete all, they shall have some music, and finish with a dance.”

“A very fine plan, indeed,” said Temple, smiling, “and you really suppose I will wink at your indulging the girl in this manner? You will spoil her, Lucy; indeed you will.”

“She is the only child we have,” said Mrs. Temple, the whole tenderness of a mother adding animation to her fine countenance, but it was withal tempered so sweetly with the meek affection and kind compliance of the wife, that as she paused, expecting her husband's answer, he gazed at her tenderly, and found he was unable to refuse her request.

“She is a good girl,” said Temple.

“She is, indeed,” replied the fond mother, exultingly, “a grateful, affectionate girl; and I am sure will never lose sight of the duty she owes her parents.”

“If she does,” said he, “she must forget the example set her by the best of mothers.”

Mrs. Temple could not reply; but the delightful sensation that dilated her heart sparkled in her intelligent eye and heightened the vermillion on her cheeks.

Of all the pleasures of which the human mind is sensible, there is none equal to that which warms and expands the bosom when we are listening to commendation bestowed on us by a beloved object, and we are conscious of having deserved it.

Ye giddy flutterers in the fantastic round of dissipation, who eagerly seek pleasure in the lofty dome, rich treat, and midnight revel—tell me, thoughtless daughters of folly, have you ever found the phantom you have so long sought with unremitting assiduity?

Has she not always eluded your grasp, and when you have reached your hand to take the cup she extends to the deluded votaries, have you not found the long-expected draught strongly tinged with the bitter dregs of disappointment? I know you have. I see it in the wan cheek, sunken eye, and air of chagrin, which ever mark the children of dissipation. Pleasure is a vain illusion; she draws you on to a thousand follies, errors, and, I may say, vices, and then leaves you to deplore your thoughtless credulity.

Look, my dear friends, at yonder lovely virgin, arrayed in a white robe, devoid of ornament; behold the meekness of her countenance, the modesty of her gait; her handmaids are humility, filial piety, conjugal affection, industry and benevolence; her name is Content; she holds in her hand the cup of true felicity, and when once you have formed an intimate acquaintance with these her attendants—nay, you must admit them as your bosom friends and chief counsellors—then, whatever may be your situation in life, the meek-eyed virgin will immediately take up her abode with you.

Is poverty your portion? she will lighten your labors, preside at your frugal board, and watch your quiet slumbers.

Is your state mediocrity? she will heighten every blessing you enjoy, by informing you how grateful you should be to that bountiful Providence, who might have placed you in the most abject situation, and by teaching you to weigh your blessings against your deserts, show you how much more you receive than you have a right to expect.

Are you possessed of affluence—what an inexhaustible fund of happiness she will lay before you! To relieve the distress, redress the injured—in short to perform all the good works of peace and mercy.

Content, my dear friends, will blunt even the arrows of an adversary, so that they cannot materially harm you.

She will dwell in the humblest cottage; she will attend you even to a prison; her parent is Religion; her sisters, Patience and Hope.

She will pass with you through life, smoothing the rough paths, and treading to earth those thorns which every one must meet with as they journey onward to the appointed goal.

She will soften the pains of sickness, continue with you even in the cold, gloomy hour of death, and cheering you with the smiles of her heaven-born sister, Hope, will lead you triumphantly to a blissful eternity.

I confess I have rambled strangely from my story, but what of that? If I have been so lucky as to find the road to happiness, why should I be such a niggard as to omit so good an opportunity of pointing out the way to others?

The very basis of true peace of mind is a benevolent wish to see all the world as happy as one's self; and from my soul do I pity the selfish churl, who, remembering the little bickering of anger, envy, and fifty other disagreeables to which frail mortality is subject, would wish to avenge the affront which pride whispers him he has received.

For my own part, I can safely declare, there is not a human being in the universe whose prosperity I should not rejoice in, and to whose happiness I would not contribute to the utmost limit of my power. And may my offenses be no more remembered in the day of general retribution, than as from my soul I forgive every offense or injury received from a fellow-creature.

Merciful Heaven ! who would exchange the rapture of such a reflection for all the gaudy tinsel which the world calls pleasure!

But to return. Content dwelt in Mrs. Temple's bosom, and spread a charming animation over her countenance, as her husband led her in, to lay the plan she had formed (for the celebration of Charlotte's birthday) before Mr. Eldridge.

CHAPTER IX.

WE KNOW NOT WHAT A DAY MAY BRING FORTH.

VARIOUS were the sensations which agitated the mind of Charlotte during the day preceding the evening in which she was to meet Montraville.

Several times did she almost resolve to go to her governess, show her his letter, and be guided by her advice; but Charlotte had taken one step in the ways of imprudence, and when that is once done, there are always innumerable obstacles to prevent the erring person returning to the path of rectitude; yet these obstacles, however forcible they may appear in general, exist only in the imagination.

Charlotte feared the anger of her governess; she loved her mother, and the very idea of incurring her displeasure gave the greatest uneasiness; but there was a more forcible reason still remaining. Should she show the letter to Madame Du Pont, she must confess the means by which it came into her possession; and what would be the consequence? Mademoiselle would be turned out-of-doors.

“I must not be ungrateful,” said she. “La Rue is very kind to me; besides, I can, when I see Montraville, inform him of the impropriety of our continuing to see or correspond with each other, and request him to come no more to Chichester”

However prudent Charlotte might be in these resolutions, she certainly did not take a proper method to confirm herself in them. Several times in the course of the day, she indulged herself in reading over the letter, and each time she read it the contents sank deeper in her heart. As evening drew near, she caught herself frequently consulting her watch.

“I wish this foolish meeting was over,” said she, by way of apology to her own heart. “I wish it was over; for when I have seen him and convinced him that my resolution is not to be shaken, I shall feel my mind much easier.”

The appointed hour arrived. Charlotte and mademoiselle eluded the eye of vigilance; and Montraville, who had waited their coming with impatience, received them with rapturous and unbounded acknowledgment for their condescension. He had wisely brought Belcour with him to entertain mademoiselle, while he enjoyed an uninterrupted conversation with Charlotte.

Belcour was a man whose character might be comprised in a few words; and as he will make some figure in the ensuing pages, I shall here describe him. He possessed a genteel fortune, and had had a liberal education; dissipated, thoughtless and capricious, he paid little regard to the moral duties, and less to religious ones; eager in the pursuit of pleasure, he minded not the miseries he inflicted on others, provided his own wishes, however extravagant, were gratified. Self, daring self, was the idol he worshiped, and to that he would have sacrificed the interest and happiness of all mankind. Such was the friend of Montraville. Will not the reader be ready to imagine, that the man who could regard such a character must be actuated by the same feelings, follow the same pursuits, and be equally unworthy with the person to whom he thus gave his confidence?

But Montraville was a different character; generous in his disposition, liberal in his opinion, and good-natured almost to a fault, yet eager and impetuous in the pursuit of a favorite object, he stayed not to reflect on the consequences which might follow the attainment of his wishes; with a mind ever open to conviction, had he been so fortunate as to possess a friend who would have pointed out the cruelty of endeavoring to gain the heart of an innocent, artless girl, when he knew it was utterly impossible for him to marry her, and when the gratification of his passion would be unavoidable infamy and misery to her, and a cause of never-ceasing remorse to himself. Had these dreadful consequences been placed before him in a proper light, the humanity of his nature would have urged him to give up the pursuit. But Belcour was not his friend; he rather encouraged the growing passion of Montraville, and being pleased with the vivacity of mademoiselle, resolved to leave no argument untried which he thought might prevail on her to be the companion of their intended voyage, and he had no doubt but their example, added to the rhetoric of Montraville, would persuade Charlotte to go with them.

Charlotte had, when she went out to meet Montraville, flattered herself that her resolution was not to be shaken, and that, conscious of the impropriety of her conduct in having a clandestine intercourse with a stranger, she would never repeat the indiscretion.

But alas, poor Charlotte! she knew not the deceitfulness of her own heart, or she would have avoided the trial of her stability.

Montraville was tender, eloquent, ardent, and yet respectful.

“ Shall I not see you once more,” said he, “ before I leave England? Will you not bless me by an assurance that, when we are divided by a vast expanse of sea, I shall not be forgotten ? ”

Charlotte sighed.

“Why that sigh, my dear Charlotte? Could I flatter myself that a fear for my safety, or a wish for my welfare occasioned it, how happy it would make me!”

“I shall ever wish you well, Montraville,” said she, “but we must meet no more.”

“Oh, say not so, my lovely girl! Reflect that when I leave my native land, perhaps a few short weeks may terminate my existence; the perils of the ocean—the dangers of war——”

“I can hear no more,” said Charlotte, in a tremulous voice. “I must leave you.”

“Say you will see me once again.”

“I dare not,” said she.

“Only for one half hour to-morrow evening; ’tis my last request. I shall never trouble you again, Charlotte.”

“I know not what to say,” cried Charlotte," struggling to draw her hand from him; "let me leave you now."

"And will you come to-morrow?" said Montraville.

"Perhaps I may," said she.

"Adieu, then. I will live upon that hope until we meet again."

He kissed her hand.

She sighed an adieu, and catching hold of mademoiselle's arm, hastily entered the garden gate.

CHAPTER X.

WHEN WE HAVE EXCITED CURIOSITY,
IT IS BUT AN ACT OF GOOD NA-TURE TO GRATIFY IT.

MONTRAVILLE was the youngest son of a gentleman of fortune, whose family being numerous, he was obliged to bring up his sons to genteel professions, by the exercise of which they might hope to raise themselves into notice.

“My daughters,” said he, “have been educated like gentlewomen; and should I die before they are settled, they must have some provision made to place them above the snares and temptations which vice ever holds out to the elegant, accomplished female, when oppressed by the frowns of poverty and the sting of dependence; my boys, with only moderate incomes, when placed in the church, at the bar, or in the field, may exert their talents, make themselves friends, and raise their fortunes on the basis of merit.”

When Montraville chose the profession of arms, his father presented him with a commission, and made him a handsome provision for his private purse.

“Now, my boy,” said he; “go! seek glory on the field of battle. You have received from me all I shall ever have it in my power to bestow; it is certain I have interest to gain your promotion; but be assured that that interest shall never be exerted unless by your future conduct you deserve it. Remember, therefore, your success in life depends entirely upon yourself.

“There is one thing I consider it my duty to caution you against; the precipitancy with which young men frequently rush into matrimonial engagements, and by their thoughtlessness draw many a deserving woman into scenes of poverty and distress.

“A soldier has no business to think of a wife until his rank is such as to place him above the fear of bringing into the world a train of helpless innocents, heirs only to penury and affliction.

“If, indeed, a woman, whose fortune is sufficient to preserve you in that state of independence which I would teach you to prize, should generously bestow herself on a young soldier, whose chief hope of future prosperity depended on his successes in the field—if such a woman should offer—every barrier is removed, and I shall rejoice in a union which would promise so much felicity.

“But mark me, boy, if, on the contrary, you rush into a precipitate union with a girl of little or no fortune, take the poor creature from a comfortable home and kind friends, and plunge her into all the evils that a narrow income and increasing family can inflict, I will leave you to enjoy the blessed fruits of your rashness, for, by all that is sacred, neither my interest nor my fortune shall ever be exerted in your favor.

“I am serious,” continued he, “therefore imprint this conversation on your memory, and let it influence your future conduct. Your happiness will always be dear to me; and I wish to warn you of a rock on which the peace of many an honest fellow has been wrecked; for, believe me, the difficulties and dangers of the longest winter campaign are much easier to be borne than the pangs that would seize your heart, when you beheld the woman of your choice, the children of your affection, involved in penury and distress, and reflected that it was your own folly and precipitancy that had been the prime cause of their suffering."

As this conversation passed but a few hours before Montraville took leave of his father, it was deeply impressed on his mind; when, therefore, Belcour came with him to the place of assignation with Charlotte, he directed him to inquire of the Frenchwoman what were Miss Temple's expectations in regard to fortune.

Mademoiselle informed him, that though Charlotte's father possessed a genteel independence, it was by no means probable that he could give his daughter more than a thousand pounds; and in case she did not marry to his liking, it was possible he might not give her a single sou; nor did it appear the least likely that Mr. Temple would agree to her union with a young man on the point of embarking for the seat of war.

Montraville, therefore, concluded it was impossible he should ever marry Charlotte Temple: and what end he proposed to himself by continuing the acquaintance he had commenced with her, he did not at that moment give himself time to inquire.

CHAPTER XI.

CONFLICT OF LOVE AND DUTY.

ALMOST a week was now gone, and Charlotte continued every evening to meet Montraville, and in her heart every meeting was resolved to be the last ; but alas ! when Montraville, at parting, would earnestly entreat one more interview that treacherous heart betrayed her, and forgetful of its resolution, pleaded the cause of the enemy so powerfully, that Charlotte was unable to resist. Another and another meeting succeeded ; and so well did Montraville improve each opportunity, that the heedless girl at length confessed no idea could be so painful to her as that of never seeing him again.

“Then we will never be parted,” said he.

“ Ah, Montraville ! ” replied Charlotte, forcing a smile, “ how can it be avoided? My parents would never consent to our union; and even could they be brought to approve of it, how could I bear to be separated from my kind, my beloved mother? ”

“ Then you love your parents more than you do me, Charlotte? ”

“ I hope I do,” said she, blushing and looking down; “ I hope my affection for them will ever keep me from infringing the laws of filial duty.”

“ Well, Charlotte,” said Montraville, gravely, and letting go her hand, “ since that is the case, I find I have deceived myself with fallacious hopes. I had flattered my fond heart that I was dearer to Charlotte than anything in the world besides. I thought that you would for my sake have braved the danger of the ocean—that you would, by your affection and smiles, have softened the hardships of war; and had it been my fate to fall, that your tenderness would cheer the hour of death, and smooth my passage to another world. But farewell, Charlotte! I see you never loved me. I shall now welcome the friendly ball that deprives me of the sense of my misery.”

“ Oh, stay, unkind Montraville,” cried she, catching hold of his arm, as he pretended to leave her—stay; and to calm your fears, I will here protest, that were it not for the fear of giving pain to the best of parents, and returning their kindness with ingratitude, I would follow you through every danger, and in studying to promote your happiness, insure my own. But I cannot break my mother’s heart, Montraville; I must not bring the gray hairs of my dotting grandfather with sorrow to the grave, or make my beloved father perhaps curse the hour that gave me birth.”

She covered her face with her hands and burst into tears.

“All these distressing scenes, my dear Charlotte,” cried Montraville, “are merely the chimeras of a disturbed fancy. Your parents might perhaps grieve at first, but when they heard from your own hands that you were with a man of honor, and that it was to insure your felicity by a union with him, that you left their protection, they will, be assured, forgive an error which love alone occasioned, and when we return from America, receive you with open arms and tears of joy.”

Belcour and mademoiselle heard this last speech, and conceiving it a proper time to throw in their advice and persuasions, approached Charlotte, and so well seconded the entreaties of Montraville, that finding that mademoiselle intended going with Belcour, and feeling that her own treacherous heart too much inclined to accompany them, the hapless Charlotte consented in an evil hour that the next evening they would bring a chaise to the end of the town, and that she would leave her friends, and throw herself entirely on the protection of Montraville.

“But should you,” said she, looking earnestly at him, her eyes full of tears, “should you, forgetful of your promises, and repenting the engagements you here voluntarily enter into, forsake and leave me on a foreign shore——”

“Judge not so meanly of me,” said he. “The moment we reach our place of destination, Hymen shall sanction our love, and when I forget your goodness may Heaven forget me!”

“Ah,” said Charlotte, leaning on mademoiselle’s arm, as they walked up the garden together, “I have forgotten all that I ought to have remembered, in consenting to this intended elopement.”

“You are a strange girl,” said mademoiselle; “you never know your own mind two minutes at a time. Just now you declared Montraville's happiness was what you prized most in the world; and now I suppose you repent having insured that happiness by agreeing to accompany him abroad."

"Indeed, I do repent," replied Charlotte, "from my soul; but while discretion points out the impropriety of my conduct, inclination urges me on to ruin."

"Ruin! fiddlesticks!" said mademoiselle. "Am not I going with you, and do I feel any of these qualms?"

"You do not renounce a tender father and mother," said Charlotte.

"But I hazard my reputation," replied mademoiselle, bridling.

"True," replied Charlotte, "but you do not feel what I do." She then bade her good-night, but sleep was a stranger to her eyes, and the tear of anguish watered her pillow.

CHAPTER XII.

Nature's last, best gift,
Creature in whom excell'd whatever could
To sight or thought be named
Holy, divine! good, amiable and sweet,
How art thou fall'n!—

WHEN Charlotte left her restless bed, her languid eyes and pale cheek discovered to Madame Du Pont the little repose she had tasted.

“My dear child,” said the affectionate governess, “what is the cause of the langor so apparent in your frame? Are you not well?”

“Yes, dear madame, very well,” replied Charlotte, attempting to smile, “but I know not how it was, I could not sleep last night, and my spirits are depressed this morning.”

“Come, cheer up, my love,” said the governess; “I believe I have brought a cordial to revive them. I have just received a letter from your good mamma, and here is one for yourself.”

Charlotte hastily took the letter; it contained these words:

“As to-morrow is the anniversary of the happy day that gave my beloved girl to the anxious wishes of a maternal heart, I have requested your governess to let you come home and spend it with us, and as I know you to be a good, affectionate child, and make it your study to improve in those branches of education which you know will give most pleasure to your delighted parents, as a reward for your diligence and attention, I have prepared an agreeable surprise for your reception. Your grandfather, eager to embrace the darling of his aged heart, will come in the chaise for you; so hold yourself in readiness to attend him by nine o’clock. Your dear father joins in every tender wish for your health and future felicity which warms the heart of my dear Charlotte's affectionate mother.

L. TEMPLE."

"Gracious Heaven!" cried Charlotte, forgetting where she was, and raising her streaming eyes as if in earnest supplication.

Madame Du Pont was surprised.

"Why these tears, my love?" said she. "Why this seeming agitation? I thought the letter would have rejoiced, instead of distressing you."

"It does rejoice me," replied Charlotte, endeavoring at composure; "but I was praying for merit to deserve the unremitting attentions of the best of parents."

"You are right," said Madame Du Pont, "to ask the assistance of Heaven that you may continue to deserve their love. Continue, my dear Charlotte, in the course you have ever pursued, and you will insure at once their happiness and your own."

"Oh!" cried Charlotte, as her governess left her, "I have forfeited both forever. Yet let me reflect; the irrevocable step is not yet taken; it is not yet too late to recede from the brink of a precipice from which I can only behold the dark abyss of ruin, shame and remorse."

She arose from her seat, and flew to the apartment of La Rue.

"Oh, mademoiselle," said she, "I am snatched by a miracle from destruction! This letter has saved me; it has opened my eyes to the folly I was so near committing. I will not go, mademoselle; I will not wound the hearts of those dear parents who make my happiness the whole study of their lives."

"Well," said mademoiselle, "do as you please, miss, but pray understand that my resolution is taken, and it is not in your power to alter it. I shall meet the gentlemen at the appointed hour, and shall not be surprised at any outrage which Montraville may commit when he finds himself disappointed. Indeed, I should not be astonished were he to come immediately here and reproach you for your instability in the hearing of the whole school; and what will be the consequence? You will bear the odium of having formed the resolution of eloping, and every girl of spirit will laugh at your want of fortitude to put it into execution, while prudes and fools will load you with reproach and contempt. You will have lost the confidence of your parents, incurred their anger and the scoffs of the world; and what fruit do you expect to reap from this piece of heroism, for such, no doubt, you think it is? You will have the pleasure to reflect that you have deceived the man who adores you, and whom, in your heart, you prefer to all other men, and that you are separated from him forever.”

This eloquent harangue was given with such volubility that Charlotte did not find an opportunity to interrupt her or to offer a single word until the whole was finished, and then found her ideas so confused that she knew not what to say.

At length she determined that she would go with mademoiselle to the place of assignation, convince Montraville of the necessity of adhering to the resolution of remaining behind, assure him of her affection, and bid him adieu.

Charlotte formed this plan in her head, and exulted at the certainty of its success.

“How shall I rejoice,” said she, “in this triumph of reason over inclination; and when in the arms of my affectionate parents, I lift up my soul in gratitude to Heaven as I look back on the dangers I have escaped ! ”

The hour of assignation arrived; mademoiselle put what money and valuables she possessed in her pocket, and advised Charlotte to do the same, but she refused. “ My resolution is fixed,” said she; “ I will sacrifice love to duty.”

Mademoiselle smiled internally; and they proceeded softly down the back stairs and out of the garden gate. Montraville and Belcour were ready to receive them.

“ Now,” said Montraville, taking Charlotte in his arms, “ you are mine forever.”

“ No,” said she, withdrawing from his embrace; “ I am come to take an everlasting farewell.”

It would be useless to repeat the conversation that here ensued; suffice it to say, that Montraville used every argument that had formerly been successful, Charlotte's resolution began to waver, and he drew her almost imperceptibly toward the chaise.

"I cannot go," said she, "cease, dear Montraville, to persuade. I must not—religion, duty, forbid."

"Cruel Charlotte!" said he, "if you disappoint my ardent hopes, by all that is sacred! this hand shall put a period to my existence. I cannot—will not—live without you."

"Alas! my torn heart," said Charlotte, "how shall I act?"

"Let me direct you," said Montraville, lifting her into the chaise.

"Oh, my dear, forsaken parents!" cried Charlotte.

The chaise drove off. She shrieked and fainted in the arms of her betrayer.

CHAPTER XIII.

CRUEL DISAPPOINTMENT.

“WHAT pleasure!” cried Mr. Eldridge, as he stepped into the chaise to go for his granddaughter, “what pleasure expands the heart of an old man when he beholds the progeny of a beloved child growing up in every virtue that adorned the minds of her parents. I foolishly thought, some few years since, that every sense of joy was buried in the grave of my dear partner and my son, but my Lucy, by her filial affection, soothed my soul to peace, and this dear Charlotte has entwined herself around my heart, and opened such new scenes of delight to my view that I almost forget that I have ever been unhappy.”

When the chaise stopped he alighted with the alacrity of youth, so much do the emotions of the soul influence the body.

It was half-past eight o'clock; the ladies were assembled in the school-room, and Madame Du Pont was preparing to offer the morning sacrifice of prayer and praise, when it was discovered that mademoiselle and Charlotte were missing.

“She is busy, no doubt,” said the governess, “in preparing Charlotte for her little excursion; but pleasure should never make us forget our duty to our Creator. Go, one of you, and bid them both attend prayers.”

The lady who went to summon them soon returned, and informed the governess that the room was locked, and that she had knocked repeatedly, but received no answer.

“Good Heaven!” cried Madame Du Pont, “this is very strange;” and turning pale with terror, she went hastily to the door, and ordered it to be forced open. The apartment instantly disclosed the fact that no person had been in it the preceding night, the beds appearing as though just made. The house was instantly a scene of confusion; the garden, the pleasure grounds, were searched to no purpose; every apartment rung with the names of Miss Temple and mademoiselle; but they were too distant to hear; and every face wore the marks of disappointment.

Mr. Eldridge was sitting in the parlor, eagerly expecting his granddaughter to descend, ready equipped for her journey; he heard the confusion that reigned in the house—he heard the name of Charlotte frequently repeated.

“What can be the matter?” said he, rising, and opening the door; “I fear some accident has befallen my dear girl.”

The governess entered. The visible agitation of her countenance discovered that something extraordinary had happened.

“Where is Charlotte?” said he. “Why does not my child come to welcome her doting parent?”

“Be composed, my dear sir,” said Madame Du Pont; “do not frighten yourself unnecessarily. She is not in the house at present; but as mademoiselle is undoubtedly with her, she will speedily return in safety, and I hope they will both be able to account for this unseasonable absence in such a manner as shall remove our present uneasiness.”

“Madame,” cried the old man, with an angry look, “has my child been accustomed to go out without leave, with no other company or protector than that French-woman? Pardon me, madame, I mean no reflection on your country, but I never did like Mademoiselle La Rue; I think she is a very improper person to be intrusted with the care of such a girl as Charlotte Temple, or to be suffered to take her from under your immediate protection.”

“ You wrong me, Mr. Eldridge,” said she, “ if you suppose I have ever permitted your granddaughter to go out, unless with the other ladies. I would to Heaven I could form any probable conjecture concerning her absence this morning, but it is a mystery to me, which her return can alone unravel.”

Servants were now dispatched to every place where there was the least hope of hearing any tidings of the fugitives, but in vain.

Dreadful were the hours of horrid suspense which Mr. Eldridge passed till twelve o'clock, when the suspense was reduced to a shocking certainty, and every spark of hope, which till then they had indulged, was in a moment extinguished.

Mr. Eldridge was preparing, with a heavy heart, to return to his anxiously-expecting children, when Madame Du Pont received the following note, without either name or date:

“Miss Temple is well, and wishes to relieve the anxiety of her parents, by letting them know she has voluntarily put herself under the protection of a man whose future study shall be to make her happy. Pursuit is needless; the measures taken to avoid discovery are too effectual to be eluded. When she thinks her friends are reconciled to this precipitate step, they may, perhaps, be informed of her place of residence. Mademoiselle is with her.”

As Mademoiselle Du Pont read these cruel lines, she turned as pale as ashes, her limbs trembled, and she was forced to call for a glass of water. She loved Charlotte truly; and when she reflected on the innocence and gentleness of her disposition, she concluded it must have been the advice and machinations of La Rue which led her to this imprudent action; she recollected her agitation on the receipt of her mother's letter, and saw in it the conflict of her mind.

“Does the letter relate to Charlotte?” said Mr. Eldridge, having waited some time in expectation of Madame Du Pont’s speaking.

“It does,” she said. “Charlotte is well, but cannot return to-day.”

“Not return, madame! Where is she? Who will detain her from her fond, expecting parents?”

“You distract me with these questions, Mr. Eldridge. Indeed, I do not know where she is, or who has seduced her from her duty.”

The whole truth now rushed at once upon Mr. Eldridge’s mind

“She has eloped, then,” said he; “my child is betrayed; the darling, the comfort of my aged heart is lost! Oh, would to heaven I had died but yesterday.”

A violent gush of grief in some measure relieved him, and after several vain attempts, he at length assumed sufficient composure to read the note.

“And how shall I return to my children ?” said he. “How approach that mansion so late the habitation of peace? Alas! my dear Lucy, how will you support these heart-rending tidings! or how shall I be enabled to console you, who need so much consolation myself ?”

The old man returned to the chaise, but the light step and cheerful countenance were no more; sorrow filled his heart and guided his emotions.

He seated himself in the chaise; his venerable head reclined upon his bosom, his hands were folded, his eyes fixed on vacancy, and the large drops of sorrow rolled silently down his cheeks.

There was a mixture of anguish and resignation depicted in his countenance, as if he should say:

“Henceforth, who shall dare to boast his happiness, or even in idea contemplate its treasure, lest in the very moment his heart is exulting in his own felicity, the object which constitutes that felicity should be torn from him ? ”

CHAPTER XIV.

MATERNAL SORROW.

SLOW and heavy passed the time while the carriage was conveying Mr. Eldridge home; and yet, when he came in sight of the house, he wished a long reprieve from the dreadful task of informing Mr. and Mrs. Temple of their daughter's elopement.

It is easy to judge the anxiety of these affectionate parents, when they found the return of their father delayed so much beyond the expected time.

They were now met in the dining-parlor, and several of the young people who had been invited were already arrived.

Each different part of the company was employed in the same manner—looking out at the windows which faced the road.

At length the long-expected chaise appeared.

Mrs. Temple ran out to receive and welcome her darling—her young companions flocked around the door, each one eager to give her joy on the return of her birthday.

The door of the chaise was opened. Charlotte was not there.

“Where is my child?” cried Mrs. Temple, in breathless agitation.

Mr. Eldridge could not answer; he took hold of his daughter’s hand and led her into the house, and sinking on the first chair he came to, he burst into tears, and sobbed aloud.

“She is dead!” cried Mrs. Temple. “Oh, my dear Charlotte?” and, clasping her hands in an agony of distress, fell into strong hysterics.

Mr. Temple, who had stood speechless with surprise and fear, now ventured to inquire if indeed his Charlotte was no more.

Mr. Eldridge led him into another apartment, and putting the fatal note into his hand, cried: "Bear it like a Christian!" and turned from him, endeavoring to suppress his own too visible emotion.

It would be vain to attempt describing what Mr. Temple felt while he hastily ran over the dreadful lines. When he had finished, the paper dropped from his unnerved hand.

"Gracious Heaven!" said he, "could Charlotte act thus?"

Neither tear nor sigh escaped him, and he sat the image of mute sorrow, till aroused from his stupor by the repeated shrieks of Mrs. Temple.

He arose hastily, and rushing into the apartment where she was, folded his arms about her, and saying, "Let us be patient, my dear Lucy," nature relieved his almost bursting heart by a friendly gush of tears.

Should any one, presuming on his own philosophic temper, look with an eye of contempt on a man who could indulge in a woman's weakness, let him remember that that man was a father, and he will then pity the misery which wrung those drops from a noble and generous heart.

Mrs. Temple, beginning to be a little more composed, but still imagining her child to be dead, her husband, gently taking her hand, cried:

"You are mistaken, my love. Charlotte is not dead."

"Then she is very ill; else why did she not come? But I will go to her; the chaise is still at the door; let me go instantly to the dear girl. If I was ill, she would fly to attend me, to alleviate my sufferings, and cheer me with her love."

"Be calm, my dearest Lucy, and I will tell you all," said Mr. Temple. "You must not go; indeed you must not; it will be of no use."

"Temple," said she, assuming a look of firmness and composure, "tell me the truth, I beseech you! I cannot bear this dreadful suspense. What misfortune has befallen my child? Let me know the worst, I will endeavor to bear it as I ought."

"Lucy," said Mr. Temple, "imagine your daughter alive, and in no danger of death, what misfortune would you then dread?"

"There is one misfortune that is worse than death. But I know my child too well to suspect——"

"Be not too confident, Lucy."

"Oh, Heaven!" said she, "what horrid images do you start? Is it possible that she should forget?"

“She has forgotten us all, my love; she has preferred the love of a stranger to the affectionate protection of her friends.”

“Not eloped !” cried she, eagerly.

Mr. Temple was silent.

“You cannot contradict,” said she. “I see my fate in those tearful eyes. Oh, Charlotte—Charlotte! how ill you have requited our tenderness. But, Father of Mercies,” continued she, sinking on her knees and raising her streaming eyes and clasped hands to Heaven, “this once vouchsafe to hear a fond, distracted mother’s prayer. Oh, let thy bounteous Providence watch over the dear, thoughtless girl, save her from the miseries which I fear will be her portion; and, oh! of Thine infinite mercy, make her not a mother, lest she should some day feel what I now suffer !”

The last words faltered on her tongue, and she fell fainting into the arms of her husband, who had voluntarily dropped on his knees beside her.

A mother's anguish, when disappointed in her tenderest hopes, none but a mother can conceive. Yet, my dear young readers, I would have you read this scene with attention, and reflect that you may yourselves one day be mothers.

Oh, my friends, as you value your eternal happiness, would not, by thoughtless ingratitude, the peace of the mother who bore you. Remember the tenderness, the care, and unremitting anxiety with which she has attended to all your wants and wishes from earliest infancy to the present day. Behold the mild ray of affectionate applause that beams from her eye on the performance of your duty; listen to her reproofs with silent attention; they proceed from a heart anxious for your future felicity; you must love her; nature, all-powerful nature, has placed the seeds of filial affection in your bosoms.

Then, once more read over the sorrows of poor Mrs. Temple; remember, the mother whom you so dearly love and venerate will feel the same, should you, forgetful of the respect due to your Maker and yourself, forsake the paths of virtue, for those of vice and folly.

CHAPTER XV.

EMBARKATION.

It was with the utmost difficulty that the united efforts of mademoiselle and Montraville could support Charlotte's spirits during their short ride from Chichester to Portsmouth, where a boat waited to take them immediately on board the ship in which they were about to embark for America.

As soon as she became tolerably composed, she entreated pen and ink to write to her parents. This she did in the most affecting, artless manner, entreating their pardon and blessing, and describing the dreadful situation of her mind, the conflict she suffered in endeavoring to conquer this unfortunate attachment, and concluded with saying her only hope of future comfort consisted in the (perhaps delusive) idea she indulged, of being once more folded in their protecting arms, and hearing the words of peace and pardon from their lips.

The tears streamed incessantly while she was writing, and she was frequently obliged to lay down her pen; but when the task was completed, and she had committed the letter to the care of Montraville, to be sent to the postoffice, she became more calm, and indulging the delightful hope of soon receiving an answer that would seal her pardon, she in some measure assumed her usual cheerfulness.

But Montraville knew too well the consequences that must unavoidably ensue should this letter reach Mr. Temple; he, therefore, craftily resolved to walk on the deck, tear it to pieces, and commit the fragments to the care of Neptune, who might or might not, as it suited his convenience, convey them on shore.

All Charlotte's hopes and wishes were now centered in one, namely, that the fleet be detained at Spithead till she might receive a letter from her friends; but in this she was disappointed, for the second morning after she went on board the signal was made, the fleet weighed anchor, and in a few hours, the wind being favorable, they bade adieu to the white cliffs of Albion.

In the meantime every inquiry that could be thought of was made by Mr. and Mrs. Temple; for many days did they indulge the fond hope that she was merely gone off to be married, and that when the indissoluble knot was once tied, she would return with the partner she had chosen and entreat their blessing and forgiveness.

“And shall we not forgive her ?” said Mr. Temple.

“Forgive her !” exclaimed the mother. “Oh! yes; whatever be her errors, is she not our child? And though bowed even to the earth with shame and remorse, is it not our duty to raise the poor penitent and whisper peace and comfort to her desponding soul? Would she but return, with rapture would I fold her to my heart and bury every remembrance of her faults in the dear embrace.”

But still, day after day passed on and Charlotte did not appear, nor were any tidings to be heard of her; yet each rising morning was welcomed by some new hope. The evening brought with it disappointment. At length hope was no more, despair usurped her place, and the mansion that was once the mansion of peace became the habitation of pale, dejected melancholy.

The cheerful smile that was wont to adorn the face of Mrs. Temple was fled, and had it not been for the support of unaffected piety, and a consciousness of having ever set before her child the fairest example, she must have sunk under this heavy affliction.

“Since,” said she, “the severest scrutiny cannot charge me with any breach of duty, to have deserved this severe chastisement, I will bow before the Power who inflicts it with humble resignation to His will, nor shall the duty of a wife be totally absorbed in the feelings of the mother; I will endeavor to seem more cheerful, and by appearing in some measure to have conquered my own sorrow, alleviate the sufferings of my husband, and arouse him from the torpor into which this misfortune has plunged him. My father, too, demands my care and attention. I must not, by a selfish indulgence of my own grief, forget the interest those two dear objects take in my happiness or misery. I will wear a smile on my face, though the thorn rankles in my heart, and if by so doing, I contribute in the smallest degree to restore their peace of mind, I shall be amply rewarded for the pain the concealment of my own feelings may occasion."

Thus argued this excellent woman, and in the execution of so laudable a resolution, we shall leave her to follow the fortunes of the hapless victim of imprudence and evil counselors.

CHAPTER XVI.

NECESSARY DIGRESSION.

ON board of the ship on which Charlotte and mademoiselle were embarked, was an officer of large, unencumbered fortune and elevated rank, and whom I shall call Crayton.

He was one of those men who, having traveled in their youth, pretend to have contracted a peculiar fondness for everything foreign, and to hold in contempt the productions of their own country, and this affected partiality extended even to the women.

With him, therefore, the blushing modesty and unaffected simplicity of Charlotte passed unnoticed, but the forward pertness of La Rue, the freedom of her conversation, the elegance of her person, mixed with a certain engaging je ne sais quoi, perfectly enchanted him.

The reader, no doubt, has already developed the character of La Rue; designing, artful and selfish, she accepted the devoirs of Belcour because she was heartily weary of the retired life she led at the school, wished to be released from what she deemed a slavery, and to return to that vortex of folly and dissipation, which had once plunged her into the deepest misery; but her plan, she flattered herself, was now better formed; she resolved to put herself under the protection of no man, till she had first secured a settlement; but the clandestine manner in which she left Madame Du Pont's prevented her putting this plan into execution, though Belcour solemnly protested he would make her a handsome settlement the moment they arrived at Portsmouth. This he afterward contrived to evade by a pretended hurry of business. La Rue, readily conceiving he never meant to fulfill his promise, determined to change her battery, and attack the heart of Colonel Crayton. She soon discovered the partiality he entertained for her nation, and having imposed on him a feigned tale of distress, represented Belcour as a villain who had seduced her from her friends under the promise of marriage, and afterward betrayed her; pretending great remorse for the errors she had committed, and declaring that, whatever her affection might have been, it was now entirely extinguished, and she wished for nothing more than an opportunity to leave a course of life which her soul abhorred; but she had no friends to apply to; they had all renounced her, and guilt and misery would undoubtedly be her future portion through life.

Crayton was possessed of many amiable qualities, though the peculiar trait in his character, which we have already mentioned, in a great measure threw a shade over them. He was beloved for his humanity and benevolence by all who knew him, but he was easy and unsuspecting himself, and became a dupe to the artifice of others.

He was, when very young, united to an amiable Parisian lady, and perhaps it was his affection for her that laid the foundation for the partiality he ever retained for the whole nation. He had by her one daughter, who entered into the world but a few hours before her mother left it. This lady was universally beloved and admired, being endowed with all the virtues of her mother, without the weakness of her father. She was married to Major Beauchamp, and was at this time in the fleet with her father, attending her husband to New York.

Crayton was melted by the affected contrition and distress of La Rue; he would converse with her for hours, read to her, play cards with her, listen to all her complaints, and promise to protect her to the utmost of his power. La Rue easily saw his character; her sole aim was to awaken a passion in his bosom that might turn out to her advantage, and in this aim she was but too successful; for, before the voyage was finished, the infatuated colonel gave her from under his hand a promise of marriage on their arrival at New York, under forfeiture of five thousand pounds.

And how did our poor Charlotte pass her time during a tedious and tempestuous passage? Naturally delicate, the fatigue and sickness she endured rendered her so weak as to be almost entirely confined to her bed; yet the kindness and attention of Montraville, in some measure contributed to alleviate her sufferings, and the hope of hearing from her friends soon after their arrival, kept up her spirits, and cheered many a gloomy night.

But during the voyage a great revolution took place, not only in the fortune of La Rue, but in the bosom of Belcour. While in the pursuit of his amour with mademoiselle, he had attended little to the interesting, unobtrusive charms of Charlotte; but when, cloyed by possession, and disgusted with the art and dissimulation of the one, he beheld the simplicity and gentleness of the other, the contract became too striking not to fill him at once with surprise and admiration. He frequently conversed with Charlotte; he found her sensible, well informed, but diffident and unassuming. The langor which the fatigue of her body and perturbation of her mind spread over her delicate features, served only, in his opinion, to render her more lovely; he knew that Montraville did not design to marry her, and he formed a resolution to endeavor to gain her himself, whenever Montraville should leave her.

Let not the reader imagine Belcour's designs were honorable. Alas! when once a woman has forgot the respect due to herself by yielding to the solicitations of illicit love, she loses all the consequence, even in the eyes of the man whose art has betrayed her, and for whose sake she has sacrificed every valuable consideration.

The heedless Fair, who stoops to guilty joys,
A man may pity—but he must despise.

Nay, every libertine will think he has a right to insult her with his licentious passions; and should the unhappy creature shrink from the insolent overture, he will sneeringly taunt her with pretense of modesty.

CHAPTER XVII.

A WEDDING.

ON the day before their arrival at New York, after dinner, Crayton arose from his seat, and placing himself by made-moiselle, thus addressed the company:

“As we have nearly arrived at our destined port, I think it but my duty to inform you, my friends, that this lady,” (taking her hand) “has placed herself under my protection. I have seen and severely felt the anguish of her heart, and through every shade which cruelty or malice may throw over her, can discover the most amiable qualities. I thought it but necessary to mention my esteem for her before our disembarkation; as it is my fixed resolution, the morning after we land, to give her an undoubted title to my favor and protection by honorably uniting my fate to hers. I would wish every gentleman hence, therefore, to remember that her honor henceforth is mine; and," continued he, looking at Belcour, "should any man presume to speak in the least disrespectfully of her, I shall not hesitate to pronounce him a scoundrel."

Belcour cast at him a smile of contempt, and bowed profoundly low; he wished mademoiselle much joy in the proposed union; and assured the colonel that he need not be in the least apprehensive of any one throwing the least odium on the character of his lady, shook him by the hand with ridiculous gravity, and left the cabin.

The truth was, he was glad to get rid of La Rue, and so he was but freed from her, he cared not who fell a victim to her infamous arts.

The inexperienced Charlotte was astonished at what she heard. She thought La Rue had, like herself, only been urged by the force of her attachment to Belcour, to quit her friends, and follow him to the seat of war. How wonderful, then, that she should resolve to marry another man! It was certainly extremely wrong. It was indelicate. She mentioned her thoughts to Montraville. He laughed at her simplicity, called her a little idiot, and patting her on the cheek, said she knew nothing of the world.

“If the world sanctions such things, ’tis a very bad world, I think,” said Charlotte. “Why, I always understood that they were to have been married when they arrived at New York. I am sure Mademoiselle told me Belcour promised to marry her.

“Well, and suppose he did?”

“Why, he should be obliged to keep his word, I think.”

“Well, but I suppose he has changed his mind," said Montraville, "and then, you know, the case is altered."

Charlotte looked at him attentively for a moment. A full sense of her own situation rushed upon her own mind. She burst into tears, and remained silent. Montraville too well understood the cause of her tears. He kissed her cheek, and bidding her not to make herself uneasy, unable to bear the silent but keen remonstrance, hastily left her.

The next morning by sunrise they found themselves at anchor before the city of New York. A boat was ordered to convey the ladies on shore. Crayton accompanied them, and they were shown to a house of public entertainment. Scarcely were they seated, when the door opened and the colonel found himself in the arms of his daughter, who had landed a few minutes before him. The first transport of meeting subsided, Crayton introduced his daughter to Mademoiselle

La Rue as an old friend of her mother's (for the artful Frenchwoman had really made it appear to the credulous colonel that she was in the same convent as his first wife, and though much younger, had received many tokens of her esteem and regard).

“If, mademoiselle,” said Mrs. Beauchamp, “you were the friend of my mother, you must be worthy the esteem of all good hearts.”

“Mademoiselle will soon honor our family,” said Crayton, “by supplying the place that valuable woman filled; and as you are married, my dear, I think you will not blame——”

“Hush, my dear sir,” replied Mrs. Beauchamp. “I know my duty too well to scrutinize your conduct. Be assured, my dear father, your happiness is mine. I shall rejoice in it. But tell me,” continued she, turning to Charlotte, “who is this lovely girl? Is she your sister, mademoiselle?”

A blush, deep as the glow of the carnation, suffused the cheek of Charlotte.

“It is a young lady,” replied the colonel, “who came in the same vessel with us from England.”

He then drew his daughter aside and told her in a whisper, that Charlotte was the mistress of Montraville.

“What a pity !” said Mrs. Beauchamp, softly, casting a most compassionate glance at her. “But surely her mind is not depraved. The goodness of her heart is depicted in her ingenuous countenance.”

Charlotte caught the word pity.

“And am I already fallen so low ?” said she. A sigh escaped her, and a tear was ready to start, but Montraville appeared, and she checked the rising emotion. Mademoiselle went with the colonel and his daughter to another apartment. Charlotte remained with Montraville and Belcour. The next morning the colonel performed his promise, and La Rue became in due form Mrs. Crayton, exulted in her good fortune, and dared to look with an eye of contempt on the unfortunate but far less guilty Charlotte.

CHAPTER XVIII.

REFLECTIONS.

“AND am I indeed fallen so low,” said Charlotte, “as to be only pitied? Will the voice of approbation no more meet my ear? And shall I never again possess a friend whose face will wear a smile of joy whenever I approach? Alas! how thoughtless, how dreadfully imprudent have I been! I know not which is the most painful to endure—the sneer of contempt, or the glance of compassion which is depicted on the various countenances of my own sex; they are both equally humiliating. Ah! my dear parents, could you now see the child of your affections, the daughter whom you so dearly loved, a poor, solitary being, without society, here wearing out her heavy hours in deep regret and anguish of heart—no kind friend of her own sex to whom she can unbosom her griefs, no beloved mother, no woman of character to appear in her company; and low as your Charlotte is fallen, she cannot associate with infamy.”

These were the painful reflections which occupied the mind of Charlotte. Montraville had placed her in a small house a few miles from New York. He gave her one female attendant, and supplied her with what money she wanted; but business and pleasure so entirely occupied his time, that he had but little to devote to the woman whom he had brought from all her connections, and robbed of innocence. Sometimes, indeed, he would steal out at the close of the evening, and pass a few hours with her. And then, so much was she attached to him, that all her sorrows were forgotten while blessed with his society. She would enjoy a walk by moonlight, or sit by him in a little arbor at the bottom of the garden, and play on the harp, accompanying it with her plaintive, harmonious voice. But often, very often, did he promise to renew his visits, and forgetful of his promise, leave her to mourn her disappointment. What painful hours of expectation would she pass! She would sit at a window which looked toward a field he used to cross, counting the minutes and straining her eyes to catch the first glimpse of his person, till, blinded with tears of disappointment, she would lean her head on her hands, and give free vent to her sorrow; then catching at some new hope, she would again renew her watchful position till the shades of evening enveloped every object in a dusky cloud; she would then renew her complaints, and, with a heart bursting with disappointed love and wounded sensibility, retire to a bed which remorse had strewed with thorns, and court in vain that comforter of weary nature (who seldom visits the unhappy) to come and steep her senses in oblivion.

Who can form an adequate idea of the sorrow that preyed upon the mind of Charlotte? The wife, whose breast glows with affection for her husband, and who in return meets only indifference, can but faintly conceive her anguish.

Dreadfully painful is the situation of such a woman; but she has many comforts of which our poor Charlotte was deprived. The duteous, faithful wife, though treated with indifference, has one solid pleasure within her own bosom; she can reflect that she has not deserved neglect—that she has ever fulfilled the duties of her station with the strictest exactness; she may hope by constant assiduity and unremitting attention to recall her wanderer, and be doubly happy in his returning affection; she knows he cannot leave her to unite himself to another; he cannot cast her out to poverty and contempt.

She looks around and sees the smile of friendly welcome or the tear of affectionate consolation on the face of every person whom she favors with her esteem, and from all these circumstances she gathers comfort; but the poor girl by thoughtless passion led astray, who, in parting with honor, has forfeited the esteem of the very man to whom she has sacrificed everything dear and valuable in life, feels his indifference to be the fruit of her own folly, and laments the want of power to recall his lost affections; she knows that there is no tie but honor, and that, in a man who has been guilty of seduction, is but very feeble; he may leave her in a moment of shame and want; he may marry and forsake her forever, and should he do so, she has no redress, no friendly, soothing companion to pour into her mind the balm of consolation, no benevolent hand to lead her back to the path of rectitude; she has disgraced her friends, forfeited the good opinion of the world, and undone herself.

She feels herself like a poor solitary being in the midst of surrounding multitudes; shame bows her to the earth, remorse tears her distracted mind, and guilt, poverty and disease close the dreadful scene; she sinks unnoticed to oblivion.

The finger of contempt may point out to some passing daughter of youthful mirth the humble bed where lies this frail sister of mortality.

And will she, in the unbounded gayety of heart, exult in her unblemished fame and triumph over the silent ashes of the dead?

Oh, no; she has a heart of sensibility; she will stop and thus address the unhappy victim of folly:

“Thou hast thy faults; but surely thy sufferings have expiated them; thy errors brought thee to an early grave; but thou wert a fellow-creature—thou hast been unhappy—then be those errors forgotten.”

Then, as she stoops to pick the noxious weed from off the sod, a tear will fall and consecrate the spot to Charity.

Forever honored be the sacred drop of humanity; the angel of mercy shall record its source, and the soul from whence it sprung shall be immortal.

My dear madam, contract not your brow into a frown of disapprobation. I mean not to extenuate the faults of those unhappy women who fall victims of guilt and folly; but surely, when we reflect how many errors we ourselves are subject to, how many secret faults lie hidden in the recesses of our hearts, which we would blush to have brought into open day, and yet those faults require the lenity and pity of a benevolent judge, or awful would be our prospect of futurity. I say, my dear madam, when we consider this, we surely may pity the faults of others.

Believe me, many an unfortunate female, who has once strayed into the thorny paths of vice, would gladly return to virtue were any generous friend to endeavor to raise and reassure her; but alas! it cannot be, you say, the world would deride and scoff.

Then let me tell you, madam, it is a very unfeeling world, and does not deserve half the blessings which a bountiful Providence showers upon it.

Oh, thou benevolent Giver of all good! how shall we erring mortals dare to look up to thy mercy in the great day of retribution, if we now uncharitably refuse to overlook the errors, or alleviate the miseries of our fellow creatures!

CHAPTER XIX.

A MISTAKE DISCOVERED.

JULIA FRANKLIN was the only child of a man of large property, who left her independent mistress of an unencumbered income of seven hundred a year, at the age of eighteen; she was a girl of lively disposition, and humane, susceptible heart. She resided in New York with an uncle who loved her too well, and had too high an opinion of her prudence, to scrutinize her actions so much as would have been necessary with many young ladies who were not blest with her discretion. She was, at the time Montraville arrived at New York, the life of society, and the universal toast. Montraville was introduced to her by the following accident:

One night when he was upon guard, a dreadful fire broke out near Mr. Franklin's house, which in a few hours reduced that and several others to ashes; fortunately no lives were lost, and by the assiduity of the soldiers much valuable property was saved from the flames. In the midst of the confusion an old gentleman came up to Montraville, and putting a small box into his hands, cried: "Keep it, my good sir, till I come to you again;" and then rushed again into the thickest of the crowd; Montraville saw him no more.

He waited till the fire was quite extinguished, and the mob dispersed, but in vain; the old gentleman did not appear to claim his property; and Montraville, fearing to make an inquiry, lest he should meet with impostors who might lay claim without any legal right to the box, carried it to his lodgings, and locked it up; he naturally imagined that the person who committed it to his care knew him, and would in a day or two reclaim it; but several weeks passed on, and no inquiry being made, he began to be uneasy, and resolved to examine the contents of the box, and if they were, as he supposed, valuable, to spare no pains to discover the owner, and restore them to him. Upon opening it, he found it contained jewels to a large amount, about two hundred pounds in money, and a miniature picture set for a bracelet. On examining the picture, he thought he had somewhere seen features very like it, but could not recollect where. A few days after, being at a public assembly, he saw Miss Franklin, and the likeness was too evident to be mistaken; he inquired among his brother officers if any of them knew her, and found one who was upon terms of intimacy with the family. "Then introduce me to her immediately," said he, "for I am certain I can inform her of something which will give her particular pleasure."

He was immediately introduced, found she was the owner of the jewels, and was invited to breakfast the next morning, in order to restore them. The whole evening Montraville was honored with Julia's hand; the lively sallies of her wit, the elegance of her manner, powerfully charmed him; he forgot Charlotte, and indulged himself in saying everything that was polite and tender to Julia. But on retiring, recollection returned. "What am I about?" said he. "Though I cannot marry Charlotte, I cannot be villain enough to forsake her, nor must I dare to trifle with the heart of Julia Franklin. I will return this box," said he, "which has been the source of so much uneasiness already, and in the evening pay a visit to my poor, melancholy Charlotte, and endeavor to forget this fascinating Julia."

He arose, dressed himself, and taking the picture out, "I will reserve this from the rest," said he, "and by presenting it to her when she thinks it is lost, enhance the value of the obligation." He repaired to Mr. Franklin's, and found Julia in the breakfast parlor alone.

"How happy am I, madam," said he, "that being the fortunate instrument of saving these jewels, has been the means of procuring me the acquaintance of so amiable a lady. There are the jewels and money all safe."

“But where is the picture, sir?” said Julia.

“Here, madam. I would not willingly part with it.”

“It is the portrait of my mother,” said she, taking it from him; “’tis all that remains.” She pressed it to her lips, and a tear trembled in her eye. Montraville glanced his eyes on her gray nightgown and black ribbon, and his own feelings prevented a reply.

Julia Franklin was the very reverse of Charlotte Temple; she was tall, elegantly shaped, and possessed much of the air and manner of a woman of fashion; her complexion was a clear brown, enlivened with the glow of health; her eyes, full, black, and sparkling, darted their intelligent glances through long silken lashes; her hair was shining brown, and her features regular and striking; there was an air of innocent gayety that played about her countenance where good-humor sat triumphant.

“I have mistaken,” said Montraville. “I imagined I loved Charlotte; but, alas! I am too late convinced my attachment to her was merely the impulse of the moment. I fear I have not only entailed lasting misery on that poor girl, but also thrown a barrier in the way of my own happiness which it will be impossible to surmount. I feel I love Julia Franklin with ardor and sincerity; yet, when in her presence, I am sensible of my own inability to offer a heart worthy her acceptance, and remain silent.”

Full of these painful thoughts, Montraville walked out to see Charlotte. She saw him approaching, and ran out to meet him. She banished from her countenance the air of discontent, which ever appeared when he was absent, and met him with a smile of joy.

“I thought you had forgotten me, Montraville,” said she, “and was very unhappy.”

“I shall never forget you, Charlotte,” he replied, pressing her hand.

The uncommon gravity of his countenance and the brevity of his reply alarmed her.

“You are not well,” said she; “your hand is hot; your eyes are heavy; you are ill.”

“I am a villain,” said he mentally, as he turned from her to hide his emotion.

“But come,” continued she, tenderly, “you shall go to bed, and I will sit by and watch you; you shall be better when you have slept.”

Montraville was glad to retire, and by pretending to sleep, conceal the agitation of his mind from her penetrating eye. Charlotte watched him until a late hour, and then, lying softly down by his side, sunk into a profound sleep, from which she awoke not till late the next morning.

CHAPTER XX.

“Virtue never appears so amiable as when reaching forth her hand to raise a fallen sister.”

—CHAPTER OF ACCIDENTS.

WHEN Charlotte awoke she missed Montraville, but thinking he might have risen early to enjoy the beauties of the morning, she was preparing to follow him, when casting her eye on the table, she saw a note, and opening it hastily, she found these words:

“My dear Charlotte must not be surprised if she does not see me again for some time; unavoidable business will prevent me that pleasure. Be assured I am quite well this morning, and what your fond imagination magnified into illness, was nothing more than fatigue, which a few hours’ rest has entirely removed. Make yourself happy, and be certain of the unalterable friendship of
MONTRAVILLE.”

“Friendship,” said Charlotte, emphatically, as she finished the note. “Is it come to this at last? Alas! poor forsaken Charlottee! Thy doom is but too apparent. Montraville is no longer interested in thy happiness; and shame, remorse, and disappointed love will henceforth be thy only attendants !”

Though these were the ideas that involuntarily rushed upon the mind of Charlotte, as she perused the fatal note, yet, after a few hours elapsed, the siren hope again took possession of her bosom, and she flattered herself she could on the second perusal discover an air of tenderness in the few lines he had left, and which had at first escaped her notice.

“He certainly cannot be so base as to leave me,” said she; “and in styling himself as my friend, does he not promise to protect me? I will not torment myself with these causeless fears; I will place confidence in his honor, and sure he will not be so unjust as to abuse it.”

Just as she had, by this manner of reasoning, brought her mind to some tolerable degree of composure, she was surprised by a visit from Belcour. The dejection visible in Charlotte's countenance, her swollen eyes and neglected attire, at once told him she was unhappy.

He made no doubt Montraville had, by his coldness, alarmed her suspicions, and was resolved, if possible, to arouse her jealousy, urge her to reproach him, and by that means occasion a breach between them.

“If I can once convince her that she has a rival,” said he, “she will listen to my passion, if it is only to revenge his slights.”

Belcour knew but little of the female heart; and what he did know was only of those of loose and dissolute lives.

He had no idea that a woman might fall a victim to imprudence, and yet retain so strong a sense of honor as to reject, with horror and contempt, every solicitation to a second fault.

He never imagined that a gentle, generous female heart, once attached, when treated with unkindness, might break, but would never harbor a thought of revenge.

His visit was not long, but before he went, he fixed a scorpion in the heart of Charlotte, whose venom embittered every future hour of her life.

We will turn now, for a moment, to Colonel Crayton.

He had been three months married, and in that little time had discovered that the conduct of his lady was not so prudent as it ought to have been, but remonstrance was vain; her temper was violent, and to the colonel's great misfortune, he had conceived a sincere affection for her; she saw her own power, and with the art of Circe, made every action appear to him in what light she pleased; his acquaintances laughed at his blindness, his friends pitied his infatuation, his amiable daughter, Mrs. Beauchamp, in secret deplored the loss of her father's affection, and grieved that he should be so entirely swayed by an artful and, she much feared, infamous woman.

Mrs. Beauchamp was mild and engaging; she loved not the hurry and bustle of a city, and had prevailed on her husband to take a house a few miles from New York.

Chance led her into the same neighborhood with Charlotte. Their houses stood within a short space of each other, and their gardens joined.

She had not been long in her new habitation before the figure of Charlotte struck her; she recognized her interesting features; she saw the melancholy so conspicuous in her countenance, and her heart bled at reflecting that, perhaps, deprived of honor, friends, and all that was valuable in this life, she was doomed to linger out a wretched existence in a strange land, and sink broken-hearted into an untimely grave.

“Would to Heaven I could snatch her from so hard a fate!” said she, “but the merciless world has barred the doors of compassion against the poor, weak girl, who, perhaps, had she one kind friend to raise and reassure her, would gladly return to peace and virtue, nay, even the woman who dares to pity and endeavors to recall a wandering sister, incurs the sneer of contempt and ridicule, for an action in which even angels are said to rejoice.”

The longer Mrs. Beauchamp was a witness to the solitary life Charlotte led, the more she wished to speak to her; and often as she saw her cheeks wet with tears of anguish, she would say—“Dear sufferer, how gladly would I pour into your heart the balm of consolation, were it not for the fear of derision.”

But an incident soon happened which made her resolve to brave even the scoffs of the world, rather than not to enjoy the heavenly satisfaction of comforting a despondent fellow-creature.

Mrs. Beauchamp was an early riser. She was one morning walking in the garden, leaning on her husband's arm, when the sound of a harp attracted their notice; they listened attentively, and heard a soft, melodious voice, distinctly singing the following stanzas:

“ In vain thy glories bid me rise,
To hail the new-born day;
Alas! my morning sacrifice,
Is still to weep and pray.

“ For what are nature's charms combin'd
To one whose weary breast
Can neither peace, nor comfort find,
Nor friend whereon to rest?

“ Oh! never, never! whilst I live
Can my heart's anguish cease;
Come, friendly death, thy mandate give,
And let me be at peace.”

“ 'Tis poor Charlotte ! ” said Mrs. Beauchamp, the pellucid drop of humanity stealing down her cheek.

Major Beauchamp was alarmed at her emotion. "What, Charlotte?" said he. "Do you know her?"

In the accent of a pitying angel did she disclose to her husband Charlotte's unhappy situation, and the frequent wish she had formed of being serviceable to her.

"I fear," continued she, "the poor girl has been basely betrayed; and if I thought you would not blame me, I would pay her a visit, offer her my friendship, and endeavor to restore to her heart that peace she seems to have lost, and so pathetically laments. Who knows, my dear," laying her hand affectionately on his arm, "who knows but she has left some kind, affectionate parents to lament her errors, and would she return, they might with rapture receive the poor penitent, and wash away her faults in tears of joy? Oh! what a glorious reflection would it be for me could I be the happy instrument of restoring her. Her heart may not be depraved, Beauchamp.”

“Exalted woman,” cried Beauchamp, embracing her, “how dost thou rise every moment in my esteem! Follow the impulse of thy generous heart, my Emily. Let prudes and fools censure, if they dare, and blame a sensibility they never felt. I will exultingly tell them that the truly virtuous heart is ever inclined to pity and forgive the errors of its fellow-creatures.”

A beam of exulting joy played around the animated countenance of Mrs. Beauchamp at these encomiums bestowed on her by a beloved husband; the most delightful sensations pervaded her heart; and, having breakfasted, she prepared to visit Charlotte.

CHAPTER XXI.

A BENEVOLENT VISIT.

Teach me to feel another's woe;
To hide the fault I see;
That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me.—Pope.

WHEN Mrs. Beauchamp was dressed she began to feel embarrassed at the thought of beginning an acquaintance with Charlotte, and was distressed how to make the first visit. "I cannot go without some introduction," said she. "It will look like impertinent curiosity." At length, recollecting herself, she stepped into the garden, and, gathering a few fine cucumbers, took them in her hand by way of apology for her visit.

A glow of conscious shame vermilioned Charlotte's face as Mrs. Beauchamp entered.

"You will pardon me, madam," said she, “for not having before paid my respects to so amiable a neighbor; but we English people always keep up, whither we go, that reserve which is the characteristic of our nation. I have taken the liberty to bring you a few cucumbers; for I had observed you had none in your garden.”

Charlotte, though naturally polite and well-bred, was so confused she could hardly speak. Her kind visitor endeavored to relieve her by not noticing her embarrassment. “I am come, madam,” continued she, “to request you to spend the day with me. I shall be alone, and as we are both strangers in this country, we may hereafter be extremely happy in each other’s friendship.”

“Your friendship, madam,” said Charlotte, blushing, “is an honor to all who are favored with it. Little as I have seen of this part of the world, I am no stranger to Mrs. Beauchamp’s goodness of heart and known humanity; but my friendship——” She paused, glanced her eye upon her own visible situation, and in spite of her endeavors to suppress them, burst into tears.

Mrs. Beauchamp guessed the source from whence these tears flowed. “You seem unhappy, madam,” said she; “shall I be thought worthy your confidence? Will you intrust me with the cause of your sorrow, and rest on my assurance to exert my utmost power to serve you?” Charlotte returned a look of gratitude, but could not speak, and Mrs. Beauchamp continued: “My heart was interested in your behalf the first moment I saw you; and I only lament I had not made earlier overtures towards an acquaintance; but I flatter myself you will henceforth consider me as your friend.”

“Oh, madam!” said Charlotte, “I have forfeited the good opinion of all my friends; I have forsaken them, and undone myself.”

“Come—come, my dear,” said Mrs. Beauchamp, “you must not indulge in these gloomy thoughts; you are not, I hope, so unhappy as you imagine yourself; endeavor to be composed, and let me be favored with your company at dinner, when, if you can bring yourself to think me your friend and repose confidence in me, I am ready to convince you that it shall not be abused.”

She then arose and bade her good-morning.

At dining hour, Charlotte repaired to Mrs. Beauchamp’s, and during dinner assumed as composed an aspect as possible, but when the cloth was removed, she summoned all her resolution, and determined to make Mrs. Beauchamp acquainted with every circumstance preceding her elopement, and the earnest desire she had to quit a way of life so repugnant to her feelings.

With the benignant aspect of an angel of mercy, did Mrs. Beauchamp listen to the artless tale; she was shocked to the soul to find how large a share La Rue had in the seduction of this amiable girl, and a tear fell when she reflected that so vile a woman was now the wife of her father. When Charlotte had finished, she gave her a little time to collect her scattered spirits, and then asked her if she had written to her friends.

“ Oh, yes, madam,” said she, “ frequently; but I have broken their hearts; they are all either dead, or have cast me off forever, for I have never received a single line from them.”

“ I rather suspect,” said Mrs. Beauchamp, “ they have never had your letters; but suppose you were to hear from them, and they were willing to receive you, would you leave this cruel Montraville, and return to them ? ”

“ Would I ? ” said Charlotte, clasping her hands; “ would not the poor sailor tossed on a tempestuous ocean, threatened every moment with death, gladly return to the shore he had left to trust to its deceitful calmness? Oh, my dear madam, I would return, though to do it I were obliged to walk barefooted, and beg a scanty pittance of each traveler to support my existence. I would endure it all cheerfully, could I but once more see my dear, blessed mother, hear her pronounce my pardon, and bless me before I died; but alas! I shall never see her more; she has blotted the ungrateful Charlotte from her remembrance, and I shall sink to the grave loaded with her's and my father's curse."

Mrs. Béauchamp endeavored to soothe her.

"You shall write to them again," said she, "and I will see that the letter is sent by the first packet that sails for England; in the meantime, keep up your spirits, and hope for everything by deserving it."

She then turned the conversation, and Charlotte, having taken a cup of tea, wished her benevolent friend a good-evening.

CHAPTER XXII.

SORROWS OF THE HEART.

WHEN Charlotte returned home she endeavored to collect her thoughts, and took up a pen, in order to address those dear parents, whom, spite of her errors, she still loved with the utmost tenderness, but vain was every effort to write with the least coherence.

Her tears fell so fast, they almost blinded her, and as she proceeded to describe her unhappy situation, she became so agitated that she was obliged to give over the attempt, and retired to bed, where, overcome with the fatigue her mind had undergone, she fell into a slumber which greatly refreshed her.

She arose in the morning with spirits more adequate to the painful task she had to perform, and after several attempts, at length concluded the following letter to her mother:

“NEW YORK.

“TO MRS. TEMPLE:

“Will my once kind, my ever-beloved mother, deign to receive a letter from her guilty, but repentant child? or has she, justly incensed at my ingratitude, driven the unhappy Charlotte from her remembrance?

“Alas! shouldst thou even disown me, I dare not complain, because I have deserved it; but yet, believe me, guilty as I am, and cruelly as I have disappointed the hopes of the fondest parents that ever girl had, even in the moment when, forgetful of my duty, I fled from you and happiness—even then I loved you most, and my heart bled at the thought of what you would suffer. Oh! never—never! while I have existence, will the agony of that moment be erased from my memory. It seemed like the separation of soul and body.

“What can I plead in excuse for my conduct? Alas! nothing. That I loved my seducer is but too true. Yet, powerful as that passion is, when operating in a young heart glowing with sensibility, it never would have conquered my affection for you, my beloved parents, had I not been encouraged, nay, urged to take the fatal step by one of my own sex, who, under the mask of friendship, drew me on to ruin.

“Yet, think not that your Charlotte was so lost as to voluntarily rush into a life of infamy.

“No, my dear mother, deceived by the specious appearance of my betrayer, and every suspicion lulled asleep by the most solemn promise of marriage, I thought those promises would not so easily be forgotten.

“ I never once reflected that the man who could stoop to seduction, would not hesitate to forsake the wretched object of his passion, whenever his capricious heart grew weary of her tenderness.

“ When we arrived at this place, I vainly expected him to fulfill his engagements; but was at last fatally convinced he never intended to make me his wife, or if he had once thought of it his mind was now altered.

“ I scorned to claim from his humanity what I could not obtain from his love; I was conscious of having forfeited the only gem that could render me respectable in the eyes of the world.

“ I locked my sorrows in my own bosom, and bore my injuries in silence.

“ But how shall I proceed?

“ This man, this cruel Montraville, for whom I sacrificed honor, happiness, and the love of my friends, no longer looks on me with affection, but scorns the credulous girl whom his art has made miserable.

“ Could you see me, my dear parents, without society, without friends, stung with remorse, and (I feel the burning blush of shame dye my cheeks while I write it) tortured with the pangs of disappointed love, cut to the soul by the indifference of him, who, having deprived me of every other comfort, no longer thinks it worth his while to soothe the heart where he has planted the thorn of never-ceasing regret!

“ My daily employment is to think of you and weep, to pray for your happiness, and deplore my own folly; my nights are scarce more happy; for, if by chance I close my weary eyes, and hope some small forgetfulness of sorrow, some little time to pass in sweet oblivion, fancy, still waking, wafts me home to you; I see your beloved forms; I kneel and hear the blessed words of peace and pardon. Ecstatic joy pervades my soul. I reach my arms to catch the dear embraces; the motion chases the illusive dream; I wake to real misery.

“At other times I see my father, angry and frowning, point to horrid caves, where, on the cold, damp ground, in the agonies of death, I see my dear mother and my revered grandfather.

“I strive to raise you; you push me from you, and shrieking, cry: ‘Charlotte, thou hast murdered me.’ Horror and despair tear every tortured nerve; I start and leave my restless bed, weary and unrefreshed.

“Shocking as these reflections are, I have yet one more dreadful than the rest.

Mother, my dear mother! do not let me quite break your heart when I tell you, in a few months, in a few months I shall bring into the world an innocent witness of my guilt. Oh! my bleeding heart. I shall bring a poor little helpless creature heir to infamy and shame.

“This alone has urged me once more to address you, to interest you in behalf of this unborn, and beg you to extend your protection to the child of your lost Charlotte. For my own part, I have written so often, so frequently have pleaded for forgiveness, and entreated to be received once more beneath the paternal roof, that, having received no answer, nor even one line, I much fear you have cast me from you forever.

“But sure you cannot refuse to protect my innocent infant; it partakes not of its mother’s guilt. Oh! my father, oh! my beloved mother, now do I feel the anguish inflicted on your hearts recoiling with double force on my own.

“If my child should be a girl (which Heaven forbid), tell her the unhappy fate of her mother, and teach her to avoid my errors; if a boy, teach him to lament my miseries, but tell him not who inflicted them, lest, in wishing to revenge his mother’s injuries, he should wound the peace of his father.

“And now, dear friends of my soul, kind guardians of my infancy, farewell. I feel I never more must hope to see you. The anguish of my heart strikes at the strings of life, and in a short time I shall be at rest. Oh, could I but receive your blessing and forgiveness before I die, it would smooth my passage to the peaceful grave, and be a blessed foretaste of a happy eternity. I beseech you, curse me not, my adored parents; but let a tear of pity and pardon fall to the memory of your lost

“CHARLOTTE.”

CHAPTER XXIII.

A MAN MAY SMILE, AND SMILE AND BE A VILLAIN.

WHILE Charlotte was enjoying some small degree of comfort in the consoling friendship of Mrs. Beauchamp, Montraville was advancing rapidly in his affection toward Miss Franklin.

Julia was an amiable girl; she saw only the fair side of his character; she possessed an independent fortune, and resolved to be happy with the man of her heart, though his rank and fortune was by no means so exalted as she had a right to expect; she saw the passion which Montraville struggled to conceal; she wondered at his timidity, but imagined the distance fortune had placed between them occasioned his backwardness. She, therefore, made every advance which strict prudence and a becoming modesty could permit. Montraville saw with pleasure she was not indifferent to him; but a spark of honor which animated his bosom would not suffer him to take advantage of partiality. He was well acquainted with Charlotte's situation, and he thought there would be a double cruelty in forsaking her at such a time; and to marry Miss Franklin, while honor, humanity, every sacred law, obliged him still to protect and support Charlotte, was a baseness at which his soul shuddered.

He communicated his uneasiness to Belcour; it was the very thing his pretended friend had wished.

“And do you really,” said he, laughing, “hesitate at marrying the lovely Julia, and becoming master of her fortune, because a little, foolish, fond girl, chose to leave her friends, and run away with you to America? Dear Montra-ville, act more like a man of sense. This whining, pining Charlotte, who occasions you so much uneasiness, would have eloped with somebody else, if she had not with you."

"Would to Heaven," said Montraville, "I had never seen her. My regard for her was but the momentary passion of desire; but I feel I shall love and revere Julia Franklin as long as I live; yet to leave poor Charlotte in her present situation, would be cruel beyond description."

"Oh, my good, sentimental friend," said Belcour, "do you imagine that nobody has a right to provide for the brat but yourself?"

Montraville started.

"Sure," said he, "you cannot mean to insinuate that Charlotte is also?"

"I don't insinuate it," said Belcour; "I know it."

Montraville turned pale as ashes.

“Then there is no faith in woman,” said he.

“While I thought you were attached to her,” said Belcour, with an air of indifference, “I never wished to make you uneasy by mentioning her perfidy; but, as I know you love and are beloved by Miss Franklin, I was determined not to let these foolish scruples of honor step between you and happiness, or your tenderness for the peace of a perfidious girl prevent your uniting yourself to a woman of honor.”

“Good heavens !” said Montraville, “what poignant reflections does a man endure who sees a lovely woman plunged in infamy, and is conscious he was her first seducer. But are you certain of what you say, Belcour ?”

“So far,” said he, “that I myself have received advances from her, which I would not take advantage of out of regard for you. But, hang it, think no more about her. I dined at Franklin's to-day, and Julia bid me seek and bring you to tea; so come along, my lad, make good use of the opportunity, and receive the gifts of fortune while they are within your reach."

Montraville was too much agitated to pass a happy evening even in the company of Julia Franklin.

He determined to visit Charlotte early next morning, tax her with falsehood, and take an everlasting leave of her. But when the morning came, he was commanded on duty, and for six weeks was prevented from putting his design into execution.

At length he found an hour to spare, and walked out to spend it with Charlotte.

It was near four o'clock in the afternoon when he arrived at her cottage.

She was not in the parlor, and without calling her servant, he walked upstairs, thinking to find her in her bedroom. He opened the door, and the first object that met his eyes was Charlotte asleep on the bed, and Belcour by her side.

“Death and destruction !” said he, stamping, “this is too much. Rise, villain, and defend yourself !”

The noise awoke Charlotte.

Terrified at the furious appearance of Montraville, and seeing Belcour with him in the chamber, she caught hold of his arm, as he stood by the bedside, and eagerly asked what was the matter.

“Treacherous, infamous girl !” said he, “can you ask? How came he here?” pointing to Belcour.

“As Heaven is my witness !” replied she, weeping, “I do not know. I have not seen him for these three weeks.”

“Then you confess he sometimes visits you ?”

“He came sometimes by your desire.”

“’Tis false. I never desired him to come, and you know I did not. But mark me, Charlotte, from this instant our connection is at an end. Let Belcour or any of your favored lovers take you and provide for you; I have done with you forever !”

He was then going to leave her, but starting wildly from the bed, she threw herself on her knees before him, protested her innocence, and intreated him not to leave her.

“ Oh, Montraville !” said she, “ kill me, for pity’s sake, kill me, but do not doubt my fidelity. Do not leave me in this horrid situation. For the sake of your unborn child, oh, spurn not the wretched mother from you !”

“ Charlotte,” said he, with a firm voice, “ I shall take care that neither you nor your child want for anything in the approaching painful hour, but we meet no more.”

He then endeavored to raise her from the ground, but in vain. She clung about his knees, entreating him to believe her innocent, and conjuring Belcour to clear up the dreadful mystery.

Belcour cast upon Montraville a smile of contempt. It irritated him almost to madness.

He broke from the feeble arms of the distressed girl.

She shrieked and fell prostrate on the floor.

Montraville instantly left the house, and returned hastily to the city.

CHAPTER XXIV.

MYSTERY DEVELOPED.

UNFORTUNATELY for Charlotte, about three weeks before this unhappy rencontre, Major Beauchamp, being ordered to Rhode Island, his lady had accompanied him, so that Charlotte was deprived of her friendly advice and consoling society.

The afternoon on which Montraville had visited her she had found herself languid and fatigued, and after making a very slight dinner, had laid down to endeavor to recruit her exhausted spirits, and, contrary to her expectations, had fallen asleep.

She had not been long laid down when Belcour arrived; for he took every opportunity of visiting her, and striving to awaken her resentment against Montraville.

He inquired of the servant where her mistress was, and being told she was asleep, took up a book to amuse himself.

Having sat a few minutes, he by chance cast his eyes towards the road, and saw Montraville approaching.

He instantly conceived the diabolical scheme of ruining the unhappy Charlotte in his opinion for ever.

He therefore stole softly up-stairs, and laying himself by her side with the greatest precaution, for fear she would awake, was in that situation discovered by his credulous friend.

When Montraville spurned the weeping Charlotte from him, and left her almost distracted with terror and despair, Belcour raised her from the floor, and leading her down-stairs, assumed the part of a tender, consoling friend.

She listened to the arguments he advanced, with apparent composure; but this was only the calm of the moment.

The remembrance of Montraville's recent cruelty again rushed upon her mind; she pushed him from her with some violence, crying:

“Leave me, sir, I beseech you; leave me, for much I fear you have been the cause of my fidelity being suspected; go, leave me to the accumulated miseries my own imprudence has brought upon me.”

She then left him with precipitation, and retiring to her own apartments, threw herself on the bed, and gave vent to an agony of grief which it is impossible to describe.

It now occurred to Belcour that she might possibly write to Montraville, and endeavor to convince him of her innocence. He was well aware of her pathetic remonstrances, and sensible of the tenderness of Montraville's heart, resolved to prevent any letters reaching him.

He therefore called the servant, and by the powerful persuasion of a bribe, prevailed with her to promise whatever letters her mistress might write should be sent to him.

He then left a polite, tender note for Charlotte, and returned to New York.

His first business was to seek Montra-ville, and endeavor to convince him that what had happened would ultimately tend to his happiness.

He found him in his apartment, solitary, pensive and wrapped in disagreeable reflections.

“Why, how now, whining, pining lover?” said he, clapping him on the shoulder.

Montraville started; a momentary flush of resentment crossed his cheek, but instantly gave way to a death-like paleness, occasioned by painful remembrance—remembrance awakened by that monitor, whom, though we may in vain endeavor, we can never entirely silence.

“Belcour,” said he, “you have injured me in a tender point.”

“Prithee, Jack,” replied Belcour, “do not make a serious matter of it; how could I refuse the girl’s advances? and thank Heaven she is not your wife.”

“True,” said Montraville; “but she was innocent when I first knew her. It was I seduced her, Belcour. Had it not been for me, she had still been virtuous and happy in the affection and protection of her family.

“Pshaw,” replied Belcour, laughing, “if you had not taken advantage of her easy nature, some other would, and where is the difference, pray?”

“I wish I had never seen her,” cried he, passionately, and starting from his seat. “Oh, that cursed French woman!” added he with vehemence, “had it not been for her I might have been happy——”

He paused.

“With Julia Franklin,” said Belcour.

The name, like a sudden spark of electric fire, seemed for a moment to suspend his faculties—for a moment he was transfixed; but recovering, he caught Belcour’s hand, and cried:

“Stop—stop! I beseech you, name not the lovely Julia and the wretched Montraville in the same breath. I am a seducer—a mean, ungenerous seducer of unsuspecting innocence. I dare not hope that purity like hers would stoop to unite itself with black, premeditated guilt. Yet, by heavens! I swear, Belcour, I thought I never could forsake her; but the heart is deceitful, and now I can plainly discriminate between the impulse of a youthful passion, and the pure flame of disinterested affection.”

At that instant Julia Franklin passed the window, leaning on her uncle’s arm. She courtesied as she passed, and with a bewitching smile of modest cheerfulness, said:

“Do you bury yourselves in the house this fine evening, gents?”

There was something in the voice, the manner, the look, that was altogether irresistible.

“Perhaps she wishes my company,” said Montraville, mentally, as he snatched up his hat. "If I thought she loved me, I would confess my errors, and trust to her generosity to pity and pardon me."

He soon overtook her, and offering her his arm, they sauntered to pleasant, but unfrequented walks.

Belcour drew Mr. Franklin on one side, and entered into a political discourse. They walked faster than the young people, and Belcour, by some means, contrived to lose sight of them.

It was a fine evening in the beginning of autumn; the last remains of daylight faintly streaked the western sky, while the moon with pale and virgin luster in the room of gorgeous gold and purple, ornamented the canopy of heaven with silver, fleecy clouds, which now and then half hid her lovely face, and, by partly concealing, heightened every beauty; the zephyrs whispered softly through the trees, which now began to shed their leafy honors; a solemn silence reigned; and, to a happy mind, an evening such as this would give serenity, and calm, unruffled pleasure.

But to Montraville, while it soothed the turbulence of his passions, it brought increase of melancholy reflections.

Julia was leaning on his arm. He took her hand in his, and pressing it tenderly, sighed deeply, but continued silent. Julia was embarrassed; she wished to break a silence so unaccountable, but was unable. She loved Montraville; she saw he was unhappy, and wished to know the cause of his uneasiness, but that innate modesty which nature had implanted in the female breast, prevented her inquiring.

“I am bad company, Miss Franklin,” said he, at last recollecting himself, “but I have met with something to-day that has greatly distressed me, and I cannot shake off the disagreeable impression it has made on my mind."

"I am sorry," she replied, "that you have any cause of inquietude. I am sure if you were as happy as you deserve, and as all your friends wish you——"

She hesitated.

"And might I," replied he, with some animation, "presume to rank the amiable Julia in the number?"

"Certainly," said she; "the service you have rendered me, the knowledge of your worth, all combine to make me esteem you."

"Esteem, my lovely Julia," said he, passionately, "is but a poor, cold word. I would if I dared—if I merited your attention—but no, I must not—honor forbids—I am beneath your notice, Julia; I am miserable and cannot hope to be otherwise."

"Alas!" said Julia, "I pity you."

“ Oh, thou condescending charmer ! ” said he, “ how that sweet word cheers my heart. Indeed, if you knew all, you would pity; but at the same time, I fear you would despise me.”

Just then they were joined by Mr. Franklin and Belcour.

It had interrupted an interesting discourse. They found it impossible to converse on different subjects, and proceeded home in silence.

At Mr. Franklin's door, Montraville again pressed Julia's hand, and, faintly articulating “ good-night,” retired to his lodgings, dispirited and wretched, from a consciousness that he deserved not the affection with which he plainly saw he was honored.

CHAPTER XXV.

RECEPTION OF A LETTER.

“AND where now is our poor Charlotte ?” said Mr. Temple, one evening, as the cold blasts of autumn whistled rudely over the heath, and the yellow appearance of the distant wood, spoke the near approach of winter. In vain the cheerful fire blazed on the hearth; in vain was he surrounded by all the comforts of life; the parent was still alive in his heart; and when he thought that perhaps his once darling child was ere this exposed to all the miseries of want in a distant land, without a friend to soothe and comfort her, without the benignant look of compassion to cheer, or the angelic voice of pity to pour the balm of consolation on her wounded heart; when he thought of this, his whole soul dissolved into tenderness, and while he wiped the tear of anguish from the eye of his patient, uncomplaining Lucy, he struggled to suppress the sympathizing drop that started in his own. "Oh! my poor girl!" said Mrs. Temple, "how must she be altered, else surely she would have relieved our agonizing minds by one line to say she lived—to say she had not quite forgot the parents who almost idolized her."

"Gracious Heaven!" said Mr. Temple, starting from his seat, "who would wish to be a father to experience the agonizing pangs inflicted on a parent's heart by the ingratitude of a child?" Mrs. Temple wept. Her father took her hand. He would have said: "Be comforted, my child!" but the words died on his tongue. The sad silence that ensued was interrupted by a loud rap at the door. In a moment a servant entered with a letter in his hand.

Mrs. Temple took it from him; she cast her eyes upon the superscription. She knew the writing—" 'Tis Charlotte," said she, eagerly breaking the seal, "she has not quite forgot us." But before she had half gone through the contents, a sudden sickness seized her; she grew cold and gid̄y, and putting it into her husband's hands, she cried: "Read it; I cannot."

Mr. Temple attempted to read it aloud, but frequently paused to give vent to his tears.

"My poor, deluded child!" said he, when he had finished.

"Oh, shall we not forgive the dear penitent?" said Mrs. Temple. "We must, we will, my love; she is willing to return, and 'tis our duty to receive her."

"Father of mercy," said Mr. Eldridge, raising his clasped hands, "let me but live once more to see the dear wanderer restored to her afflicted parents, and take me from this world of sorrow whenever it seemeth best to Thy wisdom.”

“Yes, we will receive her,” said Mr. Temple; “we will endeavor to heal her wounded spirit, and speak peace and comfort to her agitated soul. I will write to her to return immediately.”

“Oh!” said Mrs. Temple. “I would, if possible, fly to her, support and cheer the dear sufferer in the approaching hour of distress, and tell her how nearly penitence is allied to virtue. Cannot we go and conduct her home, my love?” continued she, laying her hand on his arm. “My father will surely forgive our absence if we go to bring home his darling.”

“You cannot go, my Lucy,” said Mr. Temple; “the delicacy of your frame would but poorly sustain the fatigue of a long voyage; but I will go and bring the gentle penitent to your arms. We may still see many years of happiness.”

The struggle in the bosom of Mrs. Temple between maternal and conjugal tenderness was long and painful. At length the former triumphed, and she consented that her husband should set forward to New York by the first opportunity. She wrote to her Charlotte in the tenderest, most consoling manner, and looked forward to the happy hour when she would again embrace her with the most animated hope.

CHAPTER XXVI.

WHAT MIGHT BE EXPECTED.

IN the meantime the passion Montraville had conceived for Julia Franklin daily increased, and he saw evidently how much he was beloved by that amiable girl; he was likewise strongly impressed with an idea of Charlotte's perfidy.

What wonder, then, if he gave himself up to the delightful sensation which pervaded his bosom, and finding no obstacle arise to oppose his happiness, he solicited and obtained the hand of Julia.

A few days before his marriage, he thus addressed Belcour:

“Though Charlotte, by her abandoned conduct, has thrown herself from my protection, I still hold myself bound to support her till relieved from her present condition, and also to provide for the child. I do not intend to see her again, but I will place a sum of money in your hands which will amply supply her with every convenience, but should she require more, let her have it, and I will see it repaid. I wish I could prevail upon the poor, deluded girl to return to her friends. She was an only child, and I make no doubt but they would joyfully receive her. It would shock me greatly to see her leading a life of infamy, as I should always accuse myself as being the primary cause of her errors. If she should choose to remain under your protection, be kind to her, Belcour, I conjure you. Let not satiety prompt you to treat her in such a manner as may drive her to actions which necessity might urge her to, while her better reason disapproves them. She shall never want a friend while I live, but I never more desire to behold her; her presence would always be painful to me, and a glance from her eye would call the blush of conscious guilt into my cheek. I will write her a letter, which you may deliver when I am gone, as I shall go to St. Eustatia the day after my union with Julia, who will accompany me."

Belcour promised to fulfil the request of his friend, though nothing was further from his intentions than the least design of delivering the letter, or making Charlotte acquainted with the provision Montraville had made for her. He was bent upon the complete ruin of the unhappy girl, and supposed, by reducing her to an entire dependence upon him, to bring her by degrees to consent to gratify his ungenerous passion.

The evening before the day appointed for the nuptials of Montraville and Julia, the former retired early to bed, and, ruminating on the past scenes of his life, suffered the keenest remorse in the remembrance of Charlotte's seduction.

“Poor girl,” said he, “I will at least write and bid her adieu; I will, too, endeavor to awaken that love of virtue in her bosom which her unfortunate attachment to me has extinguished.”

He took up the pen and began to write, but words were denied him.

How could he address the woman whom he had seduced, and whom, though he thought unworthy his tenderness, he was about to bid adieu forever? How could he tell her that he was going to abjure her, and enter into the most indissoluble ties with another, and that he could not even own the infant which she bore as his child? Several letters were begun and destroyed; at length he completed the following :

“ TO CHARLOTTE :—Though I have taken up my pen to address you, my poor, injured girl, I feel I am inadequate to the task; yet, however painful the endeavor, I could not resolve upon leaving you forever without one kind line to bid you adieu—to tell you how my heart bleeds at the remembrance of what you were before you saw the hated Montraville.

“ Even now imagination paints the scene, when torn by contending passions, when struggling between love and duty, you fainted in my arms and I lifted you into the chaise.

“I see the agony of your mind, when, recovering, you found yourself on the road to Portsmouth.

“But how, my gentle girl, how could you, when so justly impressed with the value of virtue, how could you, when loving as I thought you loved me, yield to the solicitation of Belcour ?

“Oh, Charlotte, conscience tells me it was I, villian that I am, who first taught you the allurements of guilty pleasure; it was I who dragged you from the calm repose which innocence and virtue ever enjoy, and can I, dare I tell you it was not love prompted to the horrid deed ? No, thou dear, fallen angel; believe your repentant Montraville when he tells you that the man who truly loves will never betray the object of his affection.

“ Adieu, Charlotte ! Could you still find charms in a life of unoffending innocence, return to your parents; you shall never want the means of support both for yourself and child. Oh ! gracious Heaven ! may that child be entirely free from the vice of its father and the weakness of its mother.

“ To-morrow—but no, I cannot tell you what to-morrow will produce—Belcour will inform you, he also has cash for you, which I beg you will ask for whenever you may want it.

“ Once more, adieu ! Believe me, could I hear you had returned to your friends, and was enjoying that tranquility of which I have robbed you, I should be as completely happy as even you, in your fondest hours, could wish me. But till then a gloom will obscure the brightest prospects of

“ MONTRAVILLE.”

After he had sealed this letter he threw himself on the bed and enjoyed a few hours' repose.

Early in the morning Belcour tapped at his door.

He arose hastily, and prepared to meet his Julia at the altar.

“This is the letter to Charlotte,” said he, giving it to Belcour; “take it to her when we are gone to Eustatia; and I conjure you, my dear friend, not to use any sophistical arguments to prevent her return to virtue; but should she incline that way, encourage her in the thought and assist her to put her design into execution.”

CHAPTER XXVII.

Pensive she mourn'd, and hung her languid head,
Like a fair lily overcharg'd with dew.

CHARLOTTE had now been left almost three months a prey to her own melancholy reflections—sad companions, indeed; nor did any one break in upon her solitude but Belcour, who once or twice called to inquire after her health, and tell her he had in vain endeavored to bring Montraville to hear reason; and once, but only once, was her mind cheered by the receipt of an affectionate letter from Mrs. Beauchamp.

Often she had written to her perfidious seducer, and with the most persuasive eloquence endeavored to convince him of her innocence; but these letters were never suffered to reach the hands of Montraville, or they must, though on the eve of his marriage, have prevented his deserting the wretched girl.

Real anguish of heart had in a great measure faded her charms; her cheeks were pale from want of rest, and her eyes, by frequent, indeed, almost continued weeping, were sunken and heavy. Sometimes a gleam of hope would play about her heart when she thought of her parents.

“They cannot, surely,” she would say, “refuse to forgive me; or should they deny their pardon to me, they will not hate my infant on account of its mother’s errors.”

How often did the poor mourner wish for the consoling presence of the benevolent Mrs. Beauchamp.

“If she were here she would certainly comfort me, and soothe the distraction of my soul.”

She was sitting one afternoon, wrapped in these melancholy reflections, when she was interrupted by the entrance of Belcour. Great as the alteration was which incessant sorrow had made on her person, she was still interesting, still charming, and the unhallowed flame, which had urged Belcour to plant dissension between her and Montraville, still raged in his bosom; he was determined, if possible, to make her his mistress; nay, he had even conceived the diabolical scheme of taking her to New York, and making her appear in every public place where it was likely she should meet Montraville, that he might be a witness of his unmanly triumph.

When he entered the room where Charlotte was sitting; he assumed the look of tender consolatory friendship.

“And how does my lovely Charlotte?” said he, taking her hand; “I fear you are not so well as I could wish.”

“I am not well, Mr. Belcour,” said she, "very far from it; but the pains and infirmities of the body I could easily bear, nay, submit to them with patience, were they not aggravated by the most insupportable anguish of my mind."

"You are not happy, Charlotte?" said he, with a look of well-dissembled sorrow.

"Alas!" replied she, mournfully shaking her head, "how can I be happy, deserted as I am, without a friend of my own sex to whom I can unburthen my full heart; nay, my fidelity suspected by the very man for whom I have sacrificed everything valuable in life—for whom I have made myself a poor, despised creature, an outcast from society, an object only of contempt and pity?"

"You speak too meanly of yourself, Miss Temple; there is no one who would dare to treat you with contempt. All who have the pleasure of knowing you, must admire and esteem. You are lonely here, my dear girl; give me leave to conduct you to New York, where the agreeable society of some ladies I will introduce you to will dispel the sad thoughts, and I shall again see returning cheerfulness animate those lovely features."

"Oh, never—never!" cried Charlotte, emphatically. "The virtuous part of my sex will scorn me, and I will never associate with infamy. No, Belcour, here let me hide my shame and sorrow; here let me spend my few remaining days in obscurity, unknown and unpitied; here let me die unlamented, and my name sink into oblivion."

Here her tears stopped her utterance.

Belcour was awed to silence; he dared not to interrupt her, and after a moment's pause she proceeded:

"I once had conceived the thought of going to New York to seek out the still dear, though cruel, ungenerous Montraville—to throw myself at his feet and entreat his compassion—Heaven knows, not for myself; if I am no longer beloved, I will not be indebted to his pity to redress my injuries, but I would have knelt and entreated him not to forsake my poor unborn——”

She could say no more; a crimson glow rushed over her cheeks, and, covering her face with her hands, she sobbed aloud.

Something like humanity was awakened in Belcour's breast by this pathetic speech. He arose and walked toward the window, but the selfish passion which had taken possession of his heart soon stifled these finer emotions, and he thought, if Charlotte was once convinced she had no longer dependence upon Montraville, she would more readily throw herself upon his protection. Determined, therefore, to inform her of all that had happened, he again resumed his seat, and, finding she began to be composed, inquired if she had ever heard from Montraville since the unhappy rencontre in her bed-chamber.

“ Ah, no ! ” said she, “ I fear I shall never hear from him again.”

“ I am greatly of your opinion,” said Belcour, “ for he has been, for some time past, greatly attached——”

At the word “ attached,” a death-like paleness overspread the countenance of Charlotte, but she applied some harts-horn which stood beside her, and Belcour proceeded :

“ He has been for some time past greatly attached to one Miss Franklin, a pleasing, lively girl, with a large fortune.”

“ She may be richer, may be handsomer,” cried Charlotte, “ but cannot love him so well. Oh ! may she beware of his art, and not trust him too far, as I have done.”

“He addresses her publicly,” said he, “and it was rumored they were to be married before he sailed for Eustatia, whither his company is ordered.”

“Belcour,” said Charlotte, seizing his hand, and gazing at him earnestly, while her pale lips trembled with convulsive agony. “Oh, tell me, and tell me truly, I beseech you, do you think he can be such a villian as to marry another woman, and leave me to die with want and misery in a strange land? Tell me what you think; I can bear it very well; I will not shrink from this heaviest stroke of fate; I have deserved my afflictions, and I will endeavor to bear them as I ought.”

“I fear,” said Belcour, “he can be that villain.”

“Perhaps,” cried she, eagerly, interrupting him, “perhaps he is married already; come, let me know the worst,” continued she, with an affected look of composure; “you need not be afraid; I shall not send the fortunate lady a bowl of poison !”

“Well, then, my dear girl,” said he, deceived by her appearance, “they were married on Thursday, and yesterday morning they sailed for Eustatia.”

“Married—gone—say you ?” cried she, in distracted accents; “what, without a farewell, without one thought on my unhappy situation ? Oh, Montraville ! may God forgive your perfidy !”

She shrieked, and Belcour sprang forward just in time to prevent her falling to the floor.

Alarming faintings now succeeded each other and she was conveyed to her bed, from whence she earnestly prayed she might never more arise.

Belcour stayed with her that night, and in the morning found her in a high fever.

The fits she had been seized with greatly terrified him; and confined as she was now to a bed of sickness, she was no longer an object of desire; it is true, for several days he went constantly to see her, but her pale, emaciated appearance disgusted him; his visits became less frequent; he forgot the solemn charge given him by Montraville; he even forgot the money entrusted to his care; and the burning blush of indignation and shame tinged my cheek while I write it, this disgrace to humanity and manhood at length forgot even the injured Charlotte; and, attracted by the blooming health of a farmer's daughter, whom he had seen in his frequent excursions to the country, he left the unhappy girl to sink unnoticed to the grave, a prey to sickness, grief and penury, while he, having triumphed over the virtue of the artless cottager, rioted in all the intemperance of luxury and lawless pleasure.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

“BLESS my heart !” cries my young, volatile reader, “I shall never have patience to get through this volume, there are so many ahs and ohs ! so much fainting, tears and distress. I am sick to death of the subject.”

My dear, cheerful, innocent girl (for innocent I will suppose you to be, or you would acutely feel the woes of Charlotte), did conscience say, thus might it have been with me, had not Providence interposed to snatch me from destruction ? Therefore, my lively, innocent girl, I must request your patience. I am writing a tale of truth ; I mean to write it to the heart. But, if perchance the heart is rendered impenetrable by unbounded prosperity, or a continuance in vice, I expect not my tale to please, nay, I even expect it will be thrown by with disgust. But softly, gentle fair one, I pray you throw it not aside till you have perused the whole. You may find something therein to repay you for the trouble. Methinks I see a sarcastic smile sit on your countenance.

“And what,” cry you, “does the conceited author suppose we can glean from the pages, if Charlotte is held up as an object of terror, to prevent us from falling into guilty errors? Does not La Rue triumph in her shame? and, by adding art to guilt, obtain the affection of a worthy man and rise to a station where she is held with respect, and cheerfully received into all companies? What, then, is the moral you would inculcate? Would you wish us to think that a deviation from virtue, if covered by art and hypocrisy, is not an object of detestation, but on the contrary, shall raise us to fame and honor, while the hapless girl who falls a victim to her too great sensibility, shall be loaded with ignominy and shame ?”

No, my fair querist, I mean no such thing.

Remember the endeavors of the wicked are often suffered to prosper, that in the end their fall may be attended with more bitterness of heart, while the cup of affliction is poured out for wise and salutary ends, and they who are compelled to drain it even to the bitter dregs, often find comfort at the bottom; the tear of penitence blots their offence from the book of fate, and they rise from the heavy, painful trial, purified and fit for a mansion in the kingdom of eternity.

Yes, my young friends, the tear of compassion shall fall for the fate of Charlotte, while the name of La Rue shall be detested and despised. For Charlotte the soul melts with sympathy; for La Rue it feels nothing but horror and contempt.

But perhaps your gay hearts would rather follow the fortunate Mrs. Crayton through the scenes of pleasure and dissipation in which she was engaged than listen to the complaints and miseries of Charlotte. I will for once oblige you, I will for once follow her to midnight revels, balls and scenes of gayety, for in such she was constantly engaged.

I have said her person was lovely; let us add that she was surrounded by splendor and affluence, and he must know but little of the world who can wonder (however faulty such a woman's conduct) at her being followed by the men and her company courted by the women. In short, Mrs. Crayton was the universal favorite; she set the fashions; she was toasted by the gentlemen, and copied by the ladies.

Colonel Crayton was a domestic man—could he be happy with such a woman? Impossible. Remonstrance was vain. He might as well have preached to the wind as endeavor to persuade her from any action, however ridiculous, on which she had set her mind; in short, after a little ineffectual struggle, he gave up the attempt and left her to follow the bent of her own inclinations.

What those were, I think the reader must have seen enough of her character to form a just idea.

Among the number who paid their devotions at her shrine, she singled out one, a young ensign of mean birth, indifferent education, and weak intellect.

How such a man came into the army we hardly can account for; and how he afterwards rose to posts of honor is likewise strange and wonderful.

But fortune is blind, and so are those, too, frequently, who have the power of dispensing her favors; else why do we see fools and knaves at the very top of the wheel, while patient merit sinks to the extreme of the opposite abyss? But we may form a thousand conjectures on this subject, and yet never hit the right. Let us, therefore, endeavor to deserve her smiles, and whether we succeed or not, we shall feel more innate satisfaction than thousands of those who bask in the sunshine of her favor unworthily.

But to return to Mrs. Crayton. This young man, whom I shall distinguish by the name of Corydon, was the reigning favorite of her heart. He escorted her to the play, danced with her at every ball, and, when indisposition prevented her going out, it was he alone who was permitted to cheer the gloomy solitude to which she was obliged to confine herself.

Did she ever think of poor Charlotte? If she did, my dear miss, it was only to laugh at the poor girl's want of spirit in consenting to be moped up in the country, while Montraville was enjoying all the pleasures of a gay, dissipated city.

When she heard of his marriage, she smilingly said : “ So there’s an end of Madame Charlotte’s hopes. I wonder who will take her now, or what will become of the little affected prude ? ”

But, as you have led to the subject, I think we may as well return to the distressed Charlotte, and not, like the unfeeling Mrs. Crayton, shut our hearts to the call of humanity.

CHAPTER XXIX.

WE GO FORWARD AGAIN.

THE strength of Charlotte’s constitution combated against her disorder, and she began slowly to recover, though she still labored under a violent depression of spirits. How must that depression be decreased, when examining her little store, she found herself reduced to one solitary guinea, and that during her illness the attendance of an apothecary and nurse, together with many other unavoidable expenses, had involved her in debt, from which she saw no method of extricating herself.

As to the faint hope which she had entertained of hearing from and being relieved by her parents, it now entirely forsook her, for it was about four months since her letter was dispatched, and she had received no answer; she, therefore, imagined her conduct had either entirely alienated their affection from her, or broken their hearts, and she must never more hope to receive their blessings.

Never did any human being wish for death with greater fervency or juster cause, yet she had too just a sense of the duties of the Christian religion to attempt to put a period to her own existence.

“I have but to be patient a little longer,” she would cry, and nature, fatigued and fainting, will throw off this heavy load of mortality, and I shall be relieved from all my sufferings.”

It was one cold, stormy day in the latter end of December, as Charlotte sat by a handful of fire, the low state of her finances not allowing her to replenish her stock of fuel, and prudence teaching her to be careful of what she had, when she was surprised by the entrance of a farmer’s wife, who, without much ceremony, seated herself and began this curious harangue :

“I’m come to see if as how you can pay your rent, because as how we hear Captain Montable is gone away, and it’s fifty to one if he b’ant killed afore he comes back again, and then, miss or ma’am, or whatever you may be, as I was saying to my husband, where are we to look for our money ? ”

This was a stroke altogether unexpected by Charlotte.

She knew so little of the world that she had never bestowed a thought on the payment of the rent of the house; she knew, indeed, that she owed a good deal, but this was never reckoned among the others; she was thunderstruck; she hardly knew what answer to make, yet it was absolutely necessary she should say something, and judging of the gentleness of every female disposition by her own, she thought the best way to interest the woman in her favor would be to tell her candidly to what a situation she was reduced, and how little probability there was of her ever paying anybody.

Alas ! poor Charlotte; how confined was her knowledge of human nature, or she would have been convinced that the only way to endure the friendship and assistance of your surrounding acquaintance, is to convince them that you do not require, for when once the petrifying aspect of distress and penury appear, whose qualities, like Medusa's head, can change to stone all that look upon it; when once the Gorgon claims acquaintance with us, the phantom of friendship, that before courted our notice, will vanish into unsubstantial air, and the whole world before us appear a barren waste.

Pardon me, ye dear spirits of benevolence, whose benign smile and cheerful-giving hands have strewed sweet flowers on many a thorny path through which my wayward fate forced me to pass; think not, that in condemning the unfeeling texture of the human heart, I forget the spring from whence flow all the comforts I enjoy; oh, no!

I look up to you as the bright constellations, gathering new splendors from the surrounding darkness; but, ah! while I adore the benignant rays that cheered and illumined my heart, I mourn that their influence cannot extend to all the sons and daughters of affliction.

“Indeed, madam,” said poor Charlotte, in a tremulous accent, “I am at a loss what to do. Montraville placed me here and promised to defray my expenses; but he has forgotten his promise; he has forsaken me, and I have no friend who either has power or will to relieve me. Let me hope, as you see my unhappy situation, your charity——”

“Charity!” cried the woman, impatiently interrupting her. “Charity, indeed; why, mistress, charity begins at home, and I have seven children at home—honest, lawful children; and it is my duty to keep them; and do you think I shall give away my property to a nasty, impudent hussy, to maintain her and her bastard ? As I was saying to my husband the other day, what will this world come to ? Honest women are nothing nowadays, while the harlotings are set up for fine ladies, and look on us no more nor the dirt they walk upon ; but let me tell you, my fine spoken ma'am, I must have my money ; so seeing as how you can't pay it, why, you must troop, and leave all your gim-cracks and fal-de-vals behind you. I don't ask for more than my right, and nobody shall go for to hinder me from it."

"Oh, Heaven !" cried Charlotte, clasping her hands, "what will become of me ?"

"Come on ye !" retorted the unfeeling wretch. "Why, go to the barracks and work for a morsel of bread ; wash and mend the soldiers' clothes, and cook their victuals, and not expect to live in idleness on honest peoples' means. Oh,

I wish I could see the day when all such cattle were obliged to work hard and eat little; it's only what they deserve."

"Father of mercy!" cried Charlotte, "I acknowledge Thy correction just, but prepare me, I beseech Thee, for the portion of misery Thou may'st please to lay before me."

"Well," said the woman, "I shall go and tell my husband as how you can't pay; and so, d'ye see, ma'am, get ready to be packing away this very night, for you would not stay another night in this house, though I were sure you would lay in the street."

Charlotte bowed her head in silence, but the anguish of her heart was too great to permit her to articulate a single word.

CHAPTER XXX.

And what is friendship but a name,
A charm that lulls to sleep—
A shade that follows wealth and fame,
But leaves the wretch to weep!
—GOLDSMITH.

WHEN Charlotte was left to herself, she began to think what course she must take, or to whom she should apply, to prevent her perishing from want, or perhaps that very night falling a victim to the inclemency of the season.

After many perplexed thoughts she at last determined to set out for New York and inquire out Mrs. Crayton, from whom she had no doubt but she should receive immediate relief as soon as her distress was made known. She had no sooner formed this resolution than she resolved immediately to put it into execution; she therefore wrote the following little billet to Mrs. Crayton, thinking if she should have company with her, it would be better to send in the request to see her.

“ TO MRS. CRAYTON :

“ MADAM :—When we left our native land, that dear happy land which contains all that is dear to the wretched Charlotte, our prospects were the same; we both, pardon me, madam, if I say, we both too easily followed the impulses of our treacherous hearts, and trusted our happiness on a tempestuous ocean, where mine has been wrecked and lost forever; you have been more fortunate—you are united to a man of honor and humanity, united by the most sacred ties, respected, esteemed, admired, and surrounded by innumerable blessings of which I am bereaved—enjoying those pleasures which have fled my bosom, never to return, alas! sorrow and deep regret have taken their place.

“ Behold me, madam, a poor, forsaken wanderer, who has not where to lay her weary head, wherewith to supply the wants of nature, or to shield her from inclemency of the weather.

“To you I sue, to you I look for pity and relief. I ask not to be received as an intimate or equal; only for charity’s sweet sake, receive me into your hospitable mansion, allot me the meanest apartment in it, and let me breathe out my soul in prayers for your happiness; I cannot, I feel I cannot bear up under the accumulated woes that bear in upon me; but oh, my dear madam, for the love of Heaven, suffer me not to expire in the street; and when I am at peace, as soon I shall be, extend your compassion to my poor, helpless offspring, should it please Heaven that it survive its unhappy mother.

“A gleam of joy breaks in on my benighted soul, while I reflect that you cannot, will not, refuse your protection to the heart-broken

CHARLOTTE.”

When Charlotte had finished this letter, late as it was in the afternoon, and though the snow began to fall very fast, she tied up a few necessaries, which she had prepared against her expected confinement, and terrified lest she should be again exposed to the insults of her barbarous landlady, more dreadful to her wounded spirit than either storm or darkness, she set forward for New York.

It may be asked by those who, in a work of this kind, love to cavil at every trifling omission, whether Charlotte did not possess any valuable of which she could have disposed, and by that means have supported herself till Mrs. Beauchamp's return, when she would have been certain of receiving every tender attention which compassion and friendship could dictate; but let me entreat these wise, penetrating gentleman to reflect, that when Charlotte left England, it was in such haste that there was no time to purchase anything more than what was wanted for immediate use upon the voyage; and after the arrival at New York, Montraville's affection soon began to decline, so that her wardrobe consisted only of necessaries; and as to the baubles, with which fond lovers often load their mistresses, she possessed not one, except a plain gold locket of small value, which contained a lock of her mother's hair, and which the great extremity of want could not have forced her to part with.

The distance from the house which our suffering heroine occupied, to New York, was not very great; yet the snow fell so fast, and the cold was so intense, that, being unable from her situation to walk quick, she found herself almost sinking with cold and fatigue before she reached the town; her garments, which were merely suitable to the summer season, being an undress robe of plain white muslin, were wet through; and a thin, black coat and bonnet, very improper habiliments for such a climate, but poorly defended her from the cold.

In this situation she reached the city, and inquired of a foot-soldier whom she met, the way to Colonel Crayton's.

"Bless you, my sweet lady," said the soldier, with a voice and look of compassion, "I will show you the way with all my heart; but if you are going to make a petition to Madame Crayton, it is all to no purpose, I assure you; if you please, I will conduct you to Mr. Franklin's, though Miss Julia is married and gone, yet the old gentleman is very good."

"Julia Franklin," said Charlotte; "is she not married to Montraville?"

"Yes," replied the soldier, "and may God bless them, for a better officer never lived, he is so good to us all; and as to Miss Julia, all the poor folks almost worship her."

“Gracious Heavens !” cried Charlotte, “is Montraville unjust to none but me ?”

The soldier now showed her Colonel Crayton’s door, and with a beating heart she knocked for admission.

CHAPTER XXXI.

SUBJECT CONTINUED.

WHEN the door was opened, Charlotte, in a voice rendered scarcely articulate, through cold and the extreme agitation of her mind, demanded whether Mrs. Crayton was at home.

The servant hesitated; he knew that his lady was engaged at a game of picquet with her dear Corydon, nor could he think she would like to be disturbed by a person whose appearance spoke of so little consequence as Charlotte; yet there was something in her countenance that rather interested him in her favor, and he said his lady was engaged; but if she had any particular message he would deliver it.

“Take up this letter,” said Charlotte, “tell her the unhappy writer of it waits in the hall for an answer.”

The tremulous accent, the tearful eye, must have moved any heart not composed of adamant.

The man took the letter from the poor suppliant, and hastily ascended the staircase.

“A letter, madam,” said he, presenting it to his lady; “an immediate answer is required.”

“Mrs. Crayton glanced her eyes carelessly over the contents. “What stuff is this?” cried she, haughtily; “have I not told you a thousand times that I would not be plagued with beggars or petitions from people one knows nothing about? Go tell the woman I can't do anything in it. I'm sorry, but one can't relieve everybody."

The servant bowed, and heavily returned with this chilling message to Charlotte.

"Surely," said she, "Mrs. Crayton has not read my letter. Go, my friend, pray, go back to her; tell her it is Charlotte Temple who requests beneath her hospitable roof to find shelter from the inclemency of the season."

"Prithee, don't plague me, man," cried Mrs. Crayton, impatiently, as the servant advanced something in behalf of the unhappy girl. "I tell you I don't know her."

"Not know me!" cried Charlotte, rushing into the room (for she had followed the man up-stairs), "not know me—not remember the injured Charlotte Temple, who, but for you, perhaps might still have been innocent, still have been happy! Oh, La Rue, this is beyond everything I could have believed possible.”

“Upon my honor, miss,” replied the unfeeling woman with the utmost effrontery, “this is a most unaccountable address—it is beyond my comprehension. John,” continued she, turning to the servant, “the young woman is certainly out of her senses; do pray take her away, she terrifies me to death.”

“Oh, God!” cried Charlotte, clasping her hands in an agony, “this is too much; what will become of me! But I will not leave you, they shall not tear me from you; here on my knees I conjure you to save me from perishing in the street; if you really have forgotten me, O, for charity’s sweet sake, this night let me be sheltered from the winter’s piercing cold.”

The kneeling figure of Charlotte, in her affecting situation, might have moved the heart of a stone to compassion; but Mrs. Crayton remained inflexible.

In vain did Charlotte recount the time they had known each other at Chichester; in vain mention their being in the same ship; in vain were the names of Montraville and Belcour mentioned.

Mrs. Crayton could only say she was sorry for her imprudence, but could not think of having her own reputation endangered by encouraging a woman of that kind in her own house; besides, she did not know what trouble and expense she might bring upon her husband by giving shelter to a woman in her situation.

“I can at least die here,” said Charlotte. “I feel I cannot long survive this dreadful conflict. Father of mercy! here let me finish my existence.”

Her agonizing sensations overpowered her, and she fell senseless on the floor.

“Take her away,” said Mrs. Crayton; “she will really frighten me into hysterics; take her away, I say, this instant.”

“And where must I take the poor creature?” said the servant, with a voice and look of compassion.

“Anywhere,” cried she, hastily, “only don’t let me ever see her again. I declare she has flurried me so, I sha’n’t be myself again this fortnight.”

John, assisted by his fellow-servant, raised and carried her down-stairs.

“Poor soul,” said he, “you shall not lie in the street this night. I have a bed and a poor little hovel, where my wife and little ones rest them; but they shall watch to-night and you shall be sheltered from danger.”

They placed her in a chair, and the benevolent man, assisted by one of his comrades, carried her to the place where his wife and children lived.

A surgeon was sent for; he bled her; she gave signs of returning life, and before dawn she gave birth to a female infant.

After this event, she lay for some hours in a kind of stupor: and, if at any time she spoke, it was with a quickness and incoherence that plainly evinced the deprivation of reason.

CHAPTER XXXII.

REASONS WHY AND WHEREFORE.

THE reader of sensibility may perhaps be astonished to find Mrs. Crayton could so positively deny any knowledge of Charlotte; it is, therefore, but just that her conduct should in some measure be accounted for.

She had ever been fully sensible of the superiority of Charlotte's sense and virtue; she was conscious that she never would have swerved her rectitude had it not been for her bad precepts and worse example. These were things as yet unknown to her husband; and she wished not to have that part of her conduct exposed to him, as she had great reason to fear she had already lost considerable part of that power she once maintained over him.

She trembled while Charlotte was in the house, lest the colonel should return; she perfectly well remembered how much he seemed interested in her favor, while on their passage from England, and made no doubt but, should he see her in her present distress, he would offer her an asylum, and protect her to the utmost of his power.

In that case, she feared the unguarded nature of Charlotte might discover to the colonel the part she had taken in the unhappy girl's elopement, and she well knew the contrast between her own and Charlotte's conduct, would make the former appear in no very respectable light.

Had she reflected properly, she would have afforded the poor girl protection, and, by enjoining her silence, insured it by acts of repeated kindness, but vice in general blinds its votaries, and they discover their real characters to the world when they are the most studious to preserve appearances.

Just so it happened with Mrs. Crayton; her servants made no scruple of mentioning the cruel conduct of their lady to a poor distressed lunatic who claimed her protection; everyone joined in reprobating her inhumanity, nay, even Corydon thought she might at least have ordered her to be taken care of, but he dared not even hint it to her, for he lived but in her smiles, and drew from her lavish fondness large sums to support an extravagance to which the state of his own finances were very inadequate. It cannot therefore be supposed that he wished Mrs. Crayton to be very liberal in her bounty to the afflicted suppliant. Yet vice had not so entirely seared over his heart but the sorrows of Charlotte could find a vulnerable part.

Charlotte had now been three days with her humane preservers, but she was totally insensible of everything; she raved incessantly for Montraville and her father; she was not conscious of being a mother, nor took the least notice of her child, except to ask whose it was, and why it was not carried to its parents.

“ Oh ! ” said she one day, starting up on hearing the infant cry, “ why will you keep that child here? I am sure you would not if you knew how hard it was for a mother to be parted from her infant; it is like tearing the cords of life asunder.

“ Oh ! could you see the horrid sight I now behold—there—there stands my dear mother, her poor bosom bleeding at every vein; her gentle, affectionate heart torn in a thousand pieces, and all for the loss of a ruined, ungrateful child.

“ Save me—save me—from her frown! I dare not—indeed I dare not speak to her ! ”

Such were the dreadful images that haunted her distracted mind, and nature was sinking fast under the dreadful malady which medicine had no power to remove.

The surgeon who attended her was a humane man, who exerted his utmost abilities to save her; but he saw she was in want of many necessaries and comforts which the poverty of her hospitable hosts rendered them unable to provide; he therefore determined to make her situation known to some of the officers, ladies, and endeavor to make a collection for her relief.

When he returned home after making this resolution, he found a message from Mrs. Beauchamp, who had just arrived from Rhode Island, requesting he would call and see one of her children, who was very unwell.

“I do not know,” said he, as he was hastening to obey the summons, “I do not know a woman to whom I could apply with more hope of success than Mrs. Beauchamp. I will endeavor to interest her in this poor girl’s behalf; she wants the soothing balm of friendly consolation; we may perhaps save her; we will try, at least.”

“And where is she?” cried Mrs. Beauchamp, when he prescribed something for the child, and told his little pathetic tale, “where is she, sir? we will go to her immediately. Heaven forbid that I should be deaf to the calls of humanity. Come, we will go this instant."

Then seizing the doctor's arm, they sought the habitation of the dying Charlotte.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

WHICH PEOPLE VOID OF FEELING NEED NOT READ.

WHEN Mrs. Beauchamp entered the apartment of the poor sufferer, she started back in horror. On a wretched bed, without hangings and poorly supplied with covering, lay the emaciated figure of what still retained the semblance of a lovely woman, though sickness had so altered her features that Mrs. Beauchamp had not the least recollection of her person.

In a corner of a room stood a woman washing, and shivering over a small fire, two healthy, but half-naked children. The infant was asleep beside its mother, and on a chair by the bedside stood a porringer and wooden spoon containing a little gruel, and a tea-cup with about two spoonsful of wine in it.

Mrs. Beauchamp had never before beheld such a scene of poverty; she shuddered involuntarily, and exclaiming, "Heaven preserve us!" leaned on the back of the chair, ready to sink to the earth.

The doctor repented having so precipitately brought her into his affecting scene; but there was no time for apologies.

Charlotte caught the sound of her voice, and starting almost out of bed, exclaimed:

"Angel of peace and mercy, art thou come to deliver me? Oh, I know you are, for whenever you were near me I felt eased of half my sorrows; but you don't know me, nor can I, with all the recollection that I am mistress of, remember your name just now; but I know that benevolent countenance and the softness of that voice, which has so often comforted the wretched Charlotte."

Mrs. Beauchamp had, during the time Charlotte was speaking, seated herself on the bed; and taking one of her hands, she looked at her attentively, and at the name of Charlotte she perfectly conceived the whole affair. A faint sickness came over her.

"Gracious Heaven!" said she, "is this possible?" and bursting into tears, she reclined the burning head of Charlotte on her own bosom, and folding her arms about her, wept over her in silence.

"Oh," said Charlotte, "you are very good to weep thus for me; it is a long time since I shed a tear for myself; my head and heart are both on fire; but these tears of yours seem to cool and refresh me.

“ Oh, now I remember you said you would send a letter to my poor father; do you think he ever received it? or perhaps you may have brought me an answer; why don't you speak, madam ? ”

“ Does he say I may go home? Well, he is very good; I shall soon be ready.”

She then made an effort to get out of bed; but being prevented, her frenzy again returned, and she raved with the greatest wildness and incoherence.

Mrs. Beauchamp, finding it was impossible for her to be removed, contented herself with ordering the apartment to be made more comfortable, and procuring a proper nurse for both mother and child; and having learned the particulars of Charlotte's fruitless application to Mrs. Crayton from honest John, she amply rewarded him for his benevolence, and returned home with a heart oppressed with many painful sensations, but yet rendered easy by the reflection that she had performed her duty towards a distressed fellow-creature.

Early next morning she again visited Charlotte, and found her tolerably composed; she called her by name, thanked her for her goodness, and when her child was brought to her, pressed it in her arms, wept over it, and called it the offspring of disobedience.

Mrs. Beauchamp was delighted to see her so much amended, and began to hope she might recover, and in spite of her former errors, become a useful and respectable member of society; but the arrival of the doctor put an end to these delusive hopes; he said nature was making her last effort, and a few hours would most probably consign the unhappy girl to her kindred dust.

Being asked how she found herself, she replied:

“ Why, better, much better, doctor. I hope now I have but little more to suffer. I had last night a few hours’ sleep, and when I awoke recovered the whole power of recollection. I am quite sensible of my weakness; I feel I have but little longer to combat with the shafts of affliction. I have an humble confidence in the mercy of Him who died to save the world, and trust that my sufferings in this state of mortality, joined to my unfeigned repentance, through His mercy, have blotted my offences from the sight of my offended Maker. I have but one care—my poor infant! Father of mercy !” continued she, raising her eyes, “ of thy infinite goodness, grant that the sins of the parent be not visited on the unoffending child. May those who taught me to despise Thy laws be forgiven; lay not my offences to their charge I beseech Thee; and oh! shower the choicest of Thy blessings on those whose pity has soothed the afflicted heart, and made easy even the bed of pain and sickness.”

She was exhausted by this fervent address to the throne of mercy, and though her lips still moved, her voice became inarticulate; she lay for some time, as it were, in a doze, and then recovering, faintly pressed Mrs. Beauchamp's hand, and then requested that a clergyman might be sent for.

On his arrival, she joined fervently in the pious office, frequently mentioning her ingratitude to her parents as what lay most heavy at her heart.

When she had performed the last solemn duty, and was preparing to lie down, a little bustle outside the door occasioned Mrs. Beauchamp to open it and inquire the cause.

A man, in appearance about forty, presented himself, and asked for Mrs. Beauchamp.

“That is my name, sir,” said she.

“Oh, then, my dear madam,” cried he, “tell me where I may find my poor, ruined, but repentant child.”

Mrs. Beauchamp was surprised and much affected; she knew not what to say; she foresaw the agony this interview would occasion Mr. Temple, who had just arrived in search of Charlotte, and yet was sensible that the pardon and blessing of the father would soften even the agonies of death to the daughter.

She hesitated.

“Tell me, madam,” cried he, wildly, “tell me, I beseech thee, does she live? Shall I see my darling once again? Perhaps she is in this house. Lead—lead me to her, that I may bless her, and then lie down and die.”

The ardent manner in which he uttered these words occasioned him to raise his voice.

It caught the ear of Charlotte; she knew the beloved sound, and uttering a loud shriek, she sprang forward as Mr. Temple entered the room.

“ My adored father ! ”

“ My long lost child ! ”

Nature could support no more, and they both sank lifeless into the arms of the attendants.

Charlotte was again put into bed, and a few moments restored Mr. Temple; but to describe the agonies of his sufferings is past the power of any one. Though we can readily conceive, we cannot delineate the dreadful scene.

Every eye gave testimony of what each other felt—but all were silent.

When Charlotte recovered, she found herself supported in her father's arms.

She cast upon him a most impressive look, but was unable to speak.

A reviving cordial was administered.

She then asked in a low voice for her child.

It was brought to her; she put it in her father's arms.

“Protect her,” said she, “and bless your dying——”

Unable to finish the sentence, she sunk back on her pillow; her countenance was serenely composed; she regarded her father as he pressed the infant to his breast, with a steadfast look; a sudden beam of joy passed across her languid features: she raised her eyes to heaven—and then closed them forever.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

RETRIBUTION.

IN the meantime, Montraville had received orders to return to New York, arrived, and having some feeling of compassionate tenderness for the woman whom he regarded as brought to shame by himself he went in search of Belcour, to inquire whether she was safe, and whether the child lived.

He found him immersed in dissipation, and could gain no other intelligence than that Charlotte had left him, and that he knew not what had become of her.

“I cannot believe it possible,” said Montraville, “that a mind once so pure as Charlotte Temple’s should so suddenly become the mansion of vice. Beware, Belcour,” continued he, “beware if you have dared to behave either unjustly or dishonorably to that poor girl, your life shall pay the forfeit; I will avenge her cause.”

He immediately went into the country, to the house where he had left Charlotte. It was desolate.

After much inquiry he at length found the servant girl who had lived with her.

From her he learned the misery Charlotte had endured from the complicated evils of illness, poverty, and a broken heart, and that she had set out for New York on a cold winter's evening; but she could inform him no further.

Tortured almost to madness by this shocking account, he returned to the city, but before he reached it, the evening was drawing to a close.

In entering the town, he was obliged to pass several little huts, the residences of poor women, who supported themselves by washing the clothes of the officers and soldiers.

It was nearly dark; he heard from a neighboring steeple a solemn toll that seemed to say, some poor mortal was going to their last mansion; the sound struck on the heart of Montraville, and he involuntarily stopped, when from one of the houses he saw the appearance of a funeral.

Almost unknowing what he did, he followed at a small distance; and as they let the coffin into the grave, he inquired of a soldier, who stood by, and had just wiped off a tear that did honor to his heart, who it was that was just buried.

“An’ please your honor,” said the man, “ ’tis a poor girl that was brought from her friends by a cruel man, who left her when she was big with a child, and married another.”

Montraville stood motionless, and the man proceeded.

“I met her myself, not a fortnight since, one night, all cold and wet in the street; she went to Madam Crayton’s, but she would not take her in and so the poor thing went raving mad.”

Montraville could bear no more; he struck his hands against his forehead with violence, and exclaiming, “poor murdered Charlotte!” ran with precipitation towards the place where they were heaping the earth on her remains.

“Hold—hold! one moment,” said he, “close not the grave of the injured Charlotte Temple, till I have taken vengeance on her murderer.”

“Rash young man,” said Mr. Temple, “who art thou that thus disturbest the last mournful rites of the dead, and rudely breakest in upon the grief of an afflicted father?”

“If thou art the father of Charlotte Temple,” said he, gazing at him with mingled horror and amazement—“if thou art her father—I am Montraville.”

Then, falling on his knees, he continued: “Here is my bosom. I bare it to receive the stroke I merit. Strike—strike now, and save me from the misery of reflection.”

“Alas!” said Mr. Temple, “if thou wert the seducer of my child, thy own reflections be thy punishment. I wrest not the power from the hand of Omnipotence. Look on that little heap of earth; there hast thou buried the only joy of a fond father. Look at it often; and may thy heart feel such sorrow as shall merit the mercy of Heaven.”

He turned from him, and Montraville, starting up from the ground where he had thrown himself, and that instant remembering the perfidy of Belcour, flew like lightning to his lodgings. Belcour was intoxicated; Montraville impetuous; they fought, and the sword of the latter entered the heart of his adversary.

He fell, and expired almost instantly. Montraville had received a slight wound, and, overcome with the agitation of his mind, and loss of blood, was carried in a state of insensibility to his distracted wife.

A dangerous illness and obstinate delirium ensued, during which he raved incessantly for Charlotte, but a strong constitution, and the tender assiduities of Julia, in time overcame the disorder.

He recovered, but to the end of his life was subject to severe fits of melancholy, and while he remained in New York, frequently retired to the church-yard, where he wept over the grave, and regretted the untimely fate of the lovely Charlotte Temple.

CHAPTER XXXV.

CONCLUSION.

SHORTLY after the interment of his daughter, Mr. Temple, with his dear little charge and her nurse, set forward for England.

It would be impossible to do justice to the meeting-scene between him and his Lucy, and her aged father. Every heart of sensibility can easily conceive their feelings.

After the first tumult of grief was subsided, Mrs. Temple gave up the chief of her time to her grandchild, and as she grew up and improved, began almost to fancy she again possessed her Charlotte.

It was about ten years after these painful events, that Mr. and Mrs. Temple, having buried their father, were obliged to come to London on particular business, and brought the little Lucy with them.

They had been walking one evening, when, on their return they found a poor wretch sitting on the steps of the door.

She attempted to rise as they approached, but from extreme weakness was unable, and after several fruitless efforts, fell back in a fit.

Mr. Temple was not one of those men who stand to consider whether by assisting an object of distress they shall not inconvenience themselves, but, instigated by a noble, feeling heart, immediately ordered her to be carried into the house and proper restoratives applied.

She soon recovered, and fixing her eye on Mrs. Temple, cried:

“You know not, madam, what you do; you know not whom you are relieving, or you would curse me in the bitterness of your heart. Come not near me, madam, I shall contaminate you. I am the viper that stung your peace. I am the woman who turned the poor Charlotte out to perish in the street. Heaven have mercy! I see her now,” continued she, looking at Lucy; “such—such was the fair bud of innocence that my vile arts blasted ere it was half blown.”

It was in vain that Mr. and Mrs. Temple entreated her to be composed and take some refreshment.

She only drank half a glass of wine, and then told them she had been separated from her husband seven years, the chief of which she passed in riot, dissipation and vice, till, overtaken by poverty and sickness, she had been reduced to part with every valuable, and thought only of ending her life in prison, when a benevolent friend paid her debts and released her; but that, her illness increasing, she had no possible means of supporting herself, and her friends were weary of relieving her. "I have fasted," said she, "two days, and last night laid my aching head on the cold pavement; indeed, indeed, it was but just that I should experience those miseries myself, which I unfeelingly inflicted on others."

Greatly as Mr. Temple had reason to detest Mrs. Crayton, he could not behold her in this distress without some emotions of pity.

He gave her shelter that night beneath his hospitable roof, and the next day got her admission into a hospital, where, having lingered a few weeks, she died, a striking example that vice, however prosperous in the beginning, in the end leads on to misery and shame.

[THE END.]

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE RISE OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC (a History). By John Lothrop Motley. A new and handsome library edition of a Grand Historical Work. Embellished with over 50 full-page half-tone Engravings. Complete in two volumes—over 1,600 pages. Crown 8vo. Cloth, per set, $2.00. Half Morocco, gilt top, per set, $3.25.

QUO VADIS. A tale of the time of Nero, by Henryk Sienkiewicz. Complete and unabridged. Translated by Dr. S. A. Binton, author of "Ancient Egypt," etc., and S. Malevsky, with illustrations by M. DeLipman. Crown 8vo. Cloth, ornamental, 515 pages, $1.25.

WITH FIRE AND SWORD. By the author of "Quo Vadis." A tale of the past. Crown 8vo. 825 pages. $1.00.

PAN MICHAEL. By the author of "Quo Vadis." A historical tale. Crown 8vo. 530 pages. $1.00.

JULIAN, THE APOSTATE. By S. Mereshkovski. "A brilliant and effective picture of one of the most interesting characters in history, who had been shudderingly styled anti-Christ by the followers of the new faith. In descriptive beauty the work is fully equal to "Quo Vadis." Cloth 12mo. 450 pages. $1.00.

MANUAL OF MYTHOLOGY. For the use of Schools, Art Students, and General Readers, by Alexander S. Murray, Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities, British Museum. With Notes, Revisions, and Additions by William H. Klapp, Headmaster of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, Philadelphia. With 200 illustrations and an exhaustive Index. Large 12mo, 40 pages, $1.25.

THE AGE OF FABLE; OR, BEAUTIES OF MYTHOLOGY. By Thomas Bulfinch, with Notes, Revisions and Additions by William H. Klapp, Headmaster of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, Philadelphia. With 200 illustrations and an exhaustive Index. Large 12mo, 450 pages, $1.25.

This work has always been regarded as classical authority.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

- TAINÉ'S ENGLISH LITERATURE, translated from the French by Henry Van Laun, illustrated with 20 fine photogravure portraits. Best English library edition, four volumes, cloth, full gilt, octavo, per set, $10.00. Half calf, per set, $12.50. Cheaper edition, with frontispiece illustrations only, cloth, paper titles, per set, $7.50.
- STEPHEN. A SOLDIER OF THE CROSS, by Florence Morse Kingsley, author of "Titus, a Comrade of the Cross." "Since 'Ben-Hur' no story has so vividly portrayed the times of Christ."—"The Bookseller." Cloth, 12mo, 369 pages, $1.00.
- THE CROSS TRIUMPHANT, by Florence Morse Kingsley, author of "Paul and Stephen." The story of "a child of the law," who witnesses, amid the scenes of the recent life and death of Jesus, the deepening conflict between the Law and the Cross. Nazarite, priest and warrior, influenced by three women of widely-varying character, he beholds at last in the terrible hour of Jerusalem's downfall "The Cross Triumphant." Cloth, 12mo, 364 pages, $1.00.
- PAUL. A HERALD OF THE CROSS, by Florence Morse Kingsley. "A vivid and picturesque narrative of the life and times of the great Apostle." Cloth, 12mo, 450 pages, $1.00.
- AMERICAN POLITICS (non-Partisan), by Hon. Thomas V. Cooper. A history of all the Political Parties, with their views and records on all important questions. All political platforms from the beginning. Great Speeches on Great Issues. Parliamentary practice and tabulated history of chronological events. A library without this work is deficient. 8vo, 750 pages. Cloth, $3.00. Full sheep, Library style, $4.00.
- THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS, as John Bunyan wrote it. A fac-simile reproduction of the first edition, published in 1678. Antique cloth, 12mo, $1.25.
- THE FAIREST OF THE FAIR, by Hildegard Hawthorne. "The grand-daughter of Nathaniel Hawthorne possesses a full share of his wonderful genius." Cloth, 16mo, $1.25.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

AROUND THE WORLD IN EIGHTY MINUTES.

Contains over 100 photographs of the most famous places and edifices, with descriptive text. Cloth, 50 cents.

SHAKSPEARE'S COMPLETE WORKS, with a biographical sketch by Mary Cowden Clark, embellished with 64 Boydell, and numerous other illustrations, four volumes, over 2,000 pages. Half Morocco, 12mo, boxed, per set, $3.00.

THE CARE OF CHILDREN, by Elisabeth R. Scovil. "An excellent book of the most vital interest." Cloth, 12mo, $1.00.

PREPARATION FOR MOTHERHOOD, by Elisabeth R. Scovil. Cloth, 12mo, 320 pages, $1.00.

BABY'S REQUIREMENTS, by Elisabeth R. Scovil. Limp binding, leatherette, 25 cents.

NAMES FOR CHILDREN, by Elisabeth Robinson Scovil, author of "The Care of Children," "Preparation for Motherhood," etc. In family life there is no question of greater weight or importance than naming the baby. The author gives much good advice and many suggestions on the subject. Cloth, 12mo, 40 cents.

TRIF AND TRIXY, by John Habberton, author of "Helen's Babies." The story is replete with vivid and spirited scenes, and is comparatively the happiest and most delightful work Mr. Habberton has yet written. Cloth, 12mo, 50 cents.

SHE WHO WILL NOT WHEN SHE MAY, by Eleanor G. Walton. Half-tone illustrations by C. P. M. Rumford. "An exquisite prose idyl." Cloth, gilt top, deckle edges, $1.00.

A SON OF THE CAROLINAS, by C. E. Satterthwaite. A pure romance introducing a lifelike portrayal of life on the coast islands of the Palmetto State. Cloth, 12mo, 280 pages, 50 cents.

THE DAY BREAKETH, by Fannie Alricks Shugert. A tale of Rome and Jerusalem in the time of Christ. Cloth, 12mo, 280 pages, 50 cents.

WHAT WOMEN SHOULD KNOW. A woman's book about women. By Mrs. E. B. Duffy. Cloth, 320 pages, 75 cents.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

Altemus' Young Peoples' Library—Continued.

A CHILD'S STORY OF THE BIBLE, with 72 full-page illustrations.

A CHILD'S LIFE OF CHRIST, with 49 illustrations.
God has implanted in the infant heart a desire to hear of Jesus, and children are early attracted and sweetly riveted by the wonderful Story of the Master from the Manger to the Throne.

SWISS FAMILY ROBINSON, with 50 illustrations.
The father of the family tells the tale of the vicissitudes through which he and his wife and children pass, the wonderful discoveries made and dangers encountered. The book is full of interest and instruction.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS AND THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA, with 70 illustrations. Every American boy and girl should be acquainted with the story of the life of the great discoverer, with its struggles, adventures, and trials.

THE STORY OF EXPLORATION AND DISCOVERY IN AFRICA, with 80 illustrations. Records the experiences of adventures and discoveries in developing the "Dark Continent," from the early days of Bruce and Mungo Park down to Livingstone and Stanley, and the heroes of our own times. No present can be more acceptable than such a volume as this, where courage, intrepidity, resource, and devotion are so admirably mingled.

THE FABLES OF ÆSOP. Compiled from the best accepted sources. With 62 illustrations. The fables of Æsop are among the very earliest compositions of this kind, and probably have never been surpassed for point and brevity.

GULLIVER'S TRAVELS. Adapted for young readers, with 50 illustrations.

MOTHER GOOSE'S RHYMES, JINGLES AND FAIRY TALES, with 234 illustrations.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

Altemus' Young Peoples' Library—Continued.

LIVES OF THE PRESIDENTS OF THE UNITED STATES, by Prescott Holmes. With portraits of the Presidents and also of the unsuccessful candidates for the office; as well as the ablest of the Cabinet officers. It is just the book for intelligent boys, and it will help to make them intelligent and patriotic citizens.

THE STORY OF ADVENTURE IN THE FROZEN SEAS, with 70 illustrations. By Prescott Holmes. We have here brought together the records of the attempts to reach the North Pole. The book shows how much can be accomplished by steady perseverance and indomitable pluck.

ILLUSTRATED NATURAL HISTORY, by the Rev. J. G. Wood, with 80 illustrations. This author has done more to popularize the study of natural history than any other writer. The illustrations are striking and life-like.

A CHILD'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, by Charles Dickens, with 50 illustrations. Tired of listening to his children memorize the twaddle of old-fashioned English history, the author covered the ground in his own peculiar and happy style for his own children's use. When the work was published its success was instantaneous.

BLACK BEAUTY: THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A HORSE, by Anna Sewell, with 50 illustrations.
A work sure to educate boys and girls to treat with kindness all members of the animal kingdom. Recognized as the greatest story of animal life extant.

THE ARABIAN NIGHTS ENTERTAINMENTS, with 130 illustrations. Contains the most favorably known of the stories.

GRIMM'S FAIRY TALES. With 55 illustrations.

The Tales are a wonderful collection, as interesting, from a literary point of view, as they are delightful as stories.

FLOWER FABLES. By Louisa May Alcott. With numerous illustrations, full-page and text.

A series of very interesting fairy tales by the most charming of American story-tellers.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

Altemus' Young Peoples' Library—Continued.

ANDERSEN'S FAIRY TALES. By Hans Christian Andersen. With 77 illustrations.

The spirit of high moral teaching, and the delicacy of sentiment, feeling, and expression that pervade these tales make these wonderful creations not only attractive to the young, but equally acceptable to those of mature years, who are able to understand their real significance and appreciate the depth of their meaning.

GRANDFATHER'S CHAIR; A HISTORY FOR YOUTH. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. With 60 illustrations.

The story of America from the landing of the Puritans to the acknowledgment without reserve of the Independence of the United States, told with all the elegance, simplicity, grace, clearness and force for which Hawthorne is conspicuously noted.

AUNT MARTHA'S CORNER CUPBOARD, by Mary and Elizabeth Kirby, with 60 illustrations. Stories about Tea, Coffee, Sugar, Rice and Chinaware, and other accessories of the well-kept Cupboard. A book full of interest for all the girls and many of the boys.

BATTLES OF THE WAR FOR INDEPENDENCE, by Prescott Holmes, with 70 illustrations. A graphic and full history of the Rebellion of the American Colonies from the yoke and oppression of England, with the causes that led thereto, and including an account of the second war with Great Britain, and the War with Mexico.

BATTLES OF THE WAR FOR THE UNION, by Prescott Holmes, with 80 illustrations. A correct and impartial account of the greatest civil war in the annals of history. Both of these histories of American wars are a necessary part of the education of all intelligent American boys and girls.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

ALTEMUS' KIPLING SERIES.

Embracing the best known tales and stories of this popular writer. Presented in attractive handy volume size, and adapted for leisure moment reading. Large type, superior paper and attractive binding. Cloth, 35 cents.

1. THE DRUMS OF THE FORE AND AFT.
2. THE MAN WHO WAS.
3. WITHOUT BENEFIT OF CLERGY.
4. RECRUDESCENCE OF IMRAY.
5. ON GREENHOW HILL.
6. WEE WILLIE WINKIE.
7. THE MAN WHO WOULD BE KING.
8. MY OWN TRUE GHOST STORY.
9. THE COURTING OF DINAH SHADD.
10. THE INCARNATION OF KRISHNA MUL-VANEY.
11. HIS MAJESTY THE KING.
12. WITH THE MAIN GUARD.
13. THE THREE MUSKETEERS.
14. LISPETH.
15. CUPID'S ARROWS.
16. IN THE HOUSE OF SUDDHOO.
17. THE BRONCKHORST DIVORCE-CASE.
18. THE JUDGMENT OF DUNGARA.
19. GEMINI.
20. AT TWENTY-TWO.
21. ON THE CITY WALL.

ALTEMUS' ILLUSTRATED ONE SYLLABLE SERIES FOR YOUNG READEARS.

Embracing popular works arranged for the young folks in words of one syllable.

Printed from extra large clear type on fine enamelled paper and fully illustrated by famous artists. The handsomest line of books for young children before the public.

Fine English cloth; handsome, new, original designs, 50 cents.

-
1. ÆSOP'S FABLES. 62 illustrations.
 2. A CHILD'S LIFE OF CHRIST. 49 illustrations.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

One Syllable Series—Continued.

3. A CHILD'S STORY OF THE BIBLE. 72 illustrations.
4. THE ADVENTURES OF ROBINSON CRUSOE. 70 illustrations.
5. BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. 46 illustrations.
6. SWISS FAMILY ROBINSON. 50 illustrations.
7. GULLIVER'S TRAVELS. 50 illustrations.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

ALTEMUS' NEW ILLUSTRATED VADEMECUM SERIES.

Masterpieces of English and American literature, handy volume size, large type editions. Each volume contains illuminated title pages, etched portrait of author or colored frontispiece and numerous engravings.

Full cloth, ivory finish, ornamental inlaid sides and back, boxed, 40 cents.

1. ABBE CONSTANTIN.—Halevy.
2. ADVENTURES OF A BROWNIE.—Mulock.
3. ALICE'S ADVENTURES IN WONDERLAND.—Carroll.
4. AMERICAN NOTES.—Kipling.
5. AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.
6. AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST TABLE.—Holmes.
11. BAB BALLALDS AND SAVOY SONGS.—Gilbert.
12. BACON'S ESSAYS.
13. BALZAC'S SHORTER STORIES.
14. BARRACK-ROOM BALLADS AND DITTIES.—Kipling.
15. BATTLE OF LIFE.—Dickens.
16. BIGLOW PAPERS.—Lowell.
17. BLACK BEAUTY.—Sewell.
18. BLITHEDALE ROMANCE, THE.—Hawthorne.
19. BRACEBRIDGE HALL.—Irving.
20. BRYANT'S POEMS.
26. CAMILLE.—Dumas, Jr.
27. CARMEN.—Merimee.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

Vademecum Series—Continued.

28. CHARLOTTE TEMPLE.—Rowson.
29. CHESTERFIELD'S LETTERS, SENTENCES AND MAXIMS.
30. CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES.—Stevenson.
31. CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE.—Byron.
32. CHIMES, THE.—Dickens.
33. CHRISTIE'S OLD ORGAN.—Walton.
34. CHRISTMAS CAROL, A.—Dickens.
35. CONFESSIONS OF AN OPIUM EATER.—De Quincey.
36. CRANFORD.—Gaskell.
37. CRICKET ON THE HEARTH.—Dickens.
38. CROWN OF WILD CLIVE, THE.—Ruskin.
43. DAY BREAKETH, THE.—Shugert.
44. DAYS WITH SIR ROGER DE COVERLY.—Addison.
45. DISCOURSES, EPICTETUS.
46. DOG OF FLANDERS, A.—Ouida.
47. DREAM LIFE.—Mitchell.
51. EMERSON'S ESSAYS, FIRST SERIES.
52. EMERSON'S ESSAYS, SECOND SERIES.
53. ENDYMION.—Keats.
54. ESSAYS OF ELIA.—Lamb.
55. ETHICS OF THE DUST.—Ruskin.
56. EVANGELINE.—Longfellow.
61. FAIRY LAND OF SCIENCE.—Buckley.
62. FANCHON.—Sand.
63. FOR DAILY BREAD.—Sienkiewicz.
67. GRAMMAR OF PALMISTRY.—St. Hill.
68. GREEK HEROES.—Kingsley.
69. GULLIVER'S TRAVEL'S.—Swift.
74. HANIA.—Sienkiewicz.
75. HAUNTED MAN, THE.—Dickens.
76. HEROES AND HERO WORSHIP.—Carlyle.
77. HIAWATHA, THE SONG OF.—Longfellow.
78. HOLME'S POEMS.
79. HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES.—Hawthorne.
80. HOUSE OF THE WOLF.—Weyman.
81. HYPERION.—Longfellow.
87. IDLE THOUGHTS OF AN IDLE FELLOW.—Jerome.
88. IDYLLS OF THE KING.—Tennyson.
89. IMPREGNABLE ROCK OF HOLY SCRIPTURE.—Gladstone.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

Vademecum Series—Continued.

90. IN BLACK AND WHITE.—Kipling.
91. IN MEMORIAM.—Tennyson.
96. JESSICA'S FIRST PRAYER.—Stretton.
97. J. COLE.—Gellibrand.
101. KAVANAGH.—Longfellow.
102. KIDNAPPED.—Stevenson.
103. KNICKERBOCKER'S HISTORY OF NEW YORK.—Irving.
107. LA BELLE NIVERNAISE.—Daudet.
108. LADDIE AND MISS TOOSEY'S MISSION.
109. LADY OF THE LAKE.—Scott.
110. LALLA ROOKH.—Moore.
111. LAST ESSAYS OF ELIA.—Lamb.
112. LAYS OF ANCIENT ROME, THE.—Macaulay.
113. LET US FOLLOW HIM.—Sienkiewicz.
114. LIGHT OF ASIA.—Arnold.
115. LIGHT THAT FAILED, THE.—Kipling.
116. LITTLE LAME PRINCE.—Mulock.
117. LONGFELLOW'S POEMS, VOL. I.
118. LONGFELLOW'S POEMS, VOL. II.
119. LOWELL'S POEMS.
120. LUCILE.—Meredith.
126. MAGIC NUTS, THE.—Molesworth.
127. MANON LESCAUT.—Prevost.
128. MARMION.—Scott.
129. MASTER OF BALLANTRAE, THE.—Stevenson
130. MILTON'S POEMS.
131. MINE OWN PEOPLE.—Kipling.
132. MINISTER OF THE WORLD.—Mason.
133. MOSSES FROM AN OLD MANSE.—Hawthorne
134. MULVANEY STORIES.—Kipling.
140. NATURAL LAW IN THE SPIRITUAL WORLD.—Drummond.
141. NATURE, ADDRESSES, AND LECTURES.—Emerson.
145. OLD CHRISTMAS.—Irving.
146. OUTRE-MER.—Longfellow.
150. PARADISE LOST.—Milton.
151. PARADISE REGAINED.—Milton.
152. PAUL AND VIRGINIA.—Sainte Pierre.
153. PETER SCHLEMIHL.—Chamisso.
154. PHANTOM RICKSHAW.—Kipling.
155. PILGRIM'S PROGRESS, THE.—Bunyan.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

Vademecum Series—Continued.

156. PLAIN TALES FROM THE HILLS.—Kipling.
157. PLEASURES OF LIFE.—Lubbock.
158. PLUTARCH'S LIVES.
159. POE'S POEMS.
160. PRINCE OF THE HOUSE OF DAVID.—Ingraham.
161. PRINCESS AND MAUD.—Tennyson.
162. PRUE AND I.—Curtis.
169. QUEEN OF THE AIR.—Ruskin.
172. RAB AND HIS FRIENDS.—Brown.
173. REPRESENTATIVE MEN.—Emerson.
174. REVERIES OF A BACHELOR.—Mitchell.
175. RIP VAN WINKLE.—Irving.
176. ROMANCE OF A POOR YOUNG MAN.—Feuillet.
177. RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM.—
182. SAMANTHA AT SARATOGA.—Holley.
183. SARTOR RESARTUS.—Carlyle.
184. SCARLET LETTER, THE.—Hawthorne.
185. SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.—Sheridan.
186. SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY, A.—Sterne.
187. SESAME AND LILIES.—Ruskin.
188. SHAKSPEARE'S HEROINES.—Jameson.
189. SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER.—Goldsmith.
190. SILAS MARNER.—Eliot.
191. SKETCH BOOK, THE.—Irving.
192. SNOW IMAGE, THE.—Hawthorne.
199. TALES FROM SHAKSPEARE.—Lamb.
200. TANGLEWOOD TALES.—Hawthorne.
201. TARTARIN OF TARASCON.—Daudet.
202. TARTARIN ON THE ALPS.—Daudet.
203. TEN NIGHTS IN A BAR-ROOM.—Arthur.
204. THINGS WILL TAKE A TURN.—Harraden.
205. THOUGHTS.—MARCUS AURELIUS.
206. THROUGH THE LOOKING GLASS.—Carroll.
207. TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS.—Hughes.
208. TREASURE ISLAND.—Stevenson.
209. TWICE TOLD TALES.—Hawthorne.
210. TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST.—Dana.
217. UNCLE TOM'S CABIN.—Stowe.
218. UNDINE.—Fouque.
222. VIC; THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A FOX-TERRIER.—Marsh.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

Vademecum Series—Continued.

223. VICAR OF WAKEFIELD.—Goldsmith.
226. WALDEN.—Thoreau.
227. WATER BABIES.—Kingsley.
228. WEIRD TALES.—Poe.
229. WHAT IS ART?—Tolstoi.
230. WHITTIER'S POEMS, VOL. I.
231. WHITTIER'S POEMS, VOL. II.
232. WINDOW IN THRUMS.—Barrie.
233. WOMAN'S WORK IN THE HOME.—Farrar.
234. WONDER BOOK, A.—Hawthorne.
241. YELLOWPLUSH PAPERS, THE.—Thackeray.
244. ZOE.—By author of "Laddie," etc.

ALTEMUS' ILLUSTRATED DEVOTIONAL SERIES.

Full White Vellum, handsome new mosaic design in gold and colors, gold edges, Boxed, 50 cents.

1. ABIDE IN CHRIST.—Murray.
2. AT THE BEAUTIFUL GATE.
3. BEECHER'S ADDRESSES.
4. BEST THOUGHTS.—From Henry Drummond.
5. BIBLE BIRTHDAY BOOK.
6. BROOKS' ADDRESSES.
7. CHAMBER OF PEACE.
8. CHANGED CROSS, THE.
9. CHRISTIAN LIFE.—Oxenden.
10. CHRISTIAN LIVING.—Meyer.
11. CHRISTIAN'S SECRET OF A HAPPY LIFE.
12. CHRISTIE'S OLD ORGAN.—Walton.
13. COMING TO CHRIST.—Havergal.
14. DAILY FOOD FOR CHRISTIANS.
15. DAY BREAKETH, THE.—Shugert.
16. DAYS OF GRACE.—Murray.
17. DRUMMOND'S ADDRESSES.
18. EVENING THOUGHTS.—Havergal.
19. GOLD DUST.
20. HOLY IN CHRIST.—Murray.
21. IMITATION OF CHRIST, THE.—A'Kempis.
22. IMPREGNABLE ROCK OF HOLY SCRIPTURE.
—Gladstone.

HENRY ALTEMUS' PUBLICATIONS.

Devotional Series—Continued.

23. JESSICA'S FIRST PRAYER.—Stretton.
24. JOHN PLOUGHMAN'S PICTURES.—Spurgeon.
25. JOHN PLOUGHMAN'S TALK.—Spurgeon.
26. KEPT FOR THE MASTER'S USE.—Havergal.
27. KEBLE'S CHRISTIAN YEAR.
28. LET US FOLLOW HIM.—Sienkiewicz.
29. LIKE CHRIST.—Murray.
30. LINE UPON LINE.
31. MANLINESS OF CHRIST, THE.—Hughes.
32. MESSAGE OF PEACE, THE.—Church.
33. MORNING THOUGHTS.—Havergal.
34. MY KING AND HIS SERVICE.—Havergal.
35. NATURAL LAW IN THE SPIRITUAL WORLD.—Drummond.
36. PALACE OF THE KING.
37. PATHWAY OF PROMISE.
38. PATHWAY OF SAFETY.—Oxenden.
39. PEEP OF DAY.
40. PILGRIM'S PROGRESS, THE.—Bunyan.
41. PRECEPT UPON PRECEPT.
42. PRINCE OF THE HOUSE OF DAVID—Ingraham.
43. SHADOW OF THE ROCK.
44. SHEPHERD PSALM.—Meyer.
45. STEPS INTO THE BLESSED LIFE.—Meyer.
46. STEPPING HEAVENWARD.—Prentiss.
47. THE THRONE OF GRACE.
48. UNTO THE DESIRED HAVEN.
49. UPLANDS OF GOD.
50. WITH CHRIST.—Murray.

ALTEMUS' EDITION SHAKSPEARE PLAYS.

HANDY VOLUME SIZE.

Limp cloth binding, gold top, illuminated title and frontispiece, 35 cents.

1. ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.
2. ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA.
3. A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.
4. AS YOU LIKE IT.
5. COMEDY OF ERRORS.
6. CORIOLANUS.
7. CYMBELINE.
8. HAMLET.
9. JULIUS CÆSAR.
10. KING HENRY IV. (Part I).
11. KING HENRY IV. (Part II).
12. KING HENRY V.
13. KING HENRY VI. (Part I).
14. KING HENRY VI. (Part II).
15. KING HENRY VI. (Part III).
16. KING HENRY VIII.
17. KING JOHN.
18. KING LEAR.
19. KING RICHARD II.
20. KING RICHARD III.
21. LOVE'S LABOUR'S LOST.
22. MACBETH.
23. MEASURE FOR MEASURE.
24. MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.
25. OTHELLO.
26. PERICLES.
27. ROMEO AND JULIET.
28. THE MERCHANT OF VENICE.
29. THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR.
30. THE TAMING OF THE SHREW.
31. THE TEMPEST.
32. THE TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA.
33. THE WINTER'S TALE.
34. TIMON OF ATHENS.
35. TITUS ANDRONICUS.
36. TROILUS AND CRESSIDA.
37. TWELFTH NIGHT.
38. VENUS AND ADONIS AND LUCRECE.
39. SONNETS, PASSIONATE PILGRIM, ETC.

